1890: Early in year, major organizational strikes by cloak makers in New York, Chicago, Boston and Philadelphia. In May another strike in New York with subsequent lock-out by Cloak Manufacturers Association. First contact with AFL, with Gompers speaking at mass meeting. Strike settled with union shop, minimum wage and settlement of grievance through peaceful negotiations.

1900: ILGWU formed and chartered by the AFL.

1900 on: Affiliated Dress Manufacturers Association formed, followed by similar employers' associations in other branches and other parts of country.

1909: Strike of the shirt makers (The Uprising of the Twenty Thousand).

1910: Involved about 15,000 workers in over 500 shops. Waist and Dress Manufacturers Association refused recognition of union as much, but 339 of 352 individual member companies negotiated with ILGWU.

1910: Strike of the cloak and suit makers in New York (The Great Revolt). Signed agreement with the Cloak Manufacturers Association known as the Protocol of Peace. Agreement conceived and formulated by a mediation committee headed by Louis D. Brandeis.

1911: Agreement similar to the protocol was signed by the Merchants' Society of Ladies Tailors of New York.

1913: Activities of the ILGWU carried on on a national basis. Strikes in Boston in the cloak and suit industry and dress industry resulted in signing of agreements with the Boston Ladies Garment Manufacturers Association and the Boston Dress and Waist Manufacturers Association.

Major strikes in New York were those of the waist and dress makers, wrapper, kimono and house dress workers, and workers in the children's dress trade, resulting in the signing of agreements similar to the protocol, with the employer associations.

1914: Agreements signed with Women's Garment Manufacturers Association and Women's Wear Manufacturers Association in Philadelphia, avoiding a general strike. Agreements of peace similar to protocol.

1915: The protocol superseded by an agreement embodying the findings and recommendations of a council of conciliation, appointed by Mayor Mitchel and headed by Dr. Felix Adler. Vital principles of the protocol remained.

Chicago strike was averted when union and cloak and suit manufacturers (Chicago Cloak and Suit Manufacturers Assocation and Northwest Cloak and Suit Manufacturers Association which were formed at that time) agreed to submit case to arbitration. Decision handed down established collective bargaining in the cloak and suit trade in Chicago.

1916: General strike in waist and dress trade in Philadelphia resulted in an agreement with the Philadelphia Waist and Dress Manufacturers Association.

1917: Agreements renewed and amended in New York without unions having to resort to strike. Organization took place in other parts of the United States.

1919: General strike throughout country of the cloak makers.

Also strikes of other workers in the apparel industry. All successful.

The ILGWU during the year signed agreements with 25 employer associations in nine cities (including Toronto), as well as with thousands of individual companies.

1921–22: Strikes in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, and Los Angeles in the cloak industry.

Strike in New York caused by the New York cloak and suit manufacturers.

Protective association's decision to return to the piecework system, cut wages, and return to a 48-hour week.

Temporary injunction granted international by the Supreme Court; made permanent in 1922. On January 10, 1922, Secretary of Commerce and of Labor suggested thorough investigation of the cloak industry, findings to be the basis of an agreement; January 16, attorney for employers notified the international that shops would be reopened under the old conditions; strike ended January 17.

1922: Strike of waist and dress makers in Philadelphia was lost and seriously disorganized the union. Chicago dress and waist agreement was renewed without a strike.

Also agreements of the cloakmakers was renewed in July 1922 for 2 years.

1924: Post of impartial chairman in cloak and suit industry formally established.

1926: Cloakmakers strike—caused by Communist element in ILGWU; 40,000 cloakmakers were involved in New York City. After 3-month strike Communist-led locals withdrew and formed Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union. (Returned to ILGWU in 1933.) Industry beset for next 7 years by dual unionism. ILGWU membership sank in 1932 to lowest level since 1910; racketeering thrived, wages were cut, etc.

1930: Strike of New York dressmakers; settled through intervention of Governor Roosevelt; significant feature was introduction of arbitration system with full-time impartial chairman in the dress industry.

1933 on: The first Nation-wide attempt to regulate the women's apparel industry came under the NIRA which was passed in 1933. Chaotic conditions in industry ended.

Cloakmakers returned to ILGWU—signed agreement with the Cloak, Suit and Skirt Manufacturers' Protective Association. Strike of dress workers in New York and its environs resulted in signing contracts with the major dress associations.

Since 1933: No major disturbances in the women's apparel industry. Some strikes, localized and of short duration.

Present status

Inasmuch as ILGWU is an industrial union, in order to represent the combined interests. ILGWU constitution provides for formation of joint boards wherever there are two or more craft unions in a city or region. For example, in New York market joint board of cloakmakers (includes locals of cutters, operators, finishers, and pressers); joint board of dressmakers (four locals). In most other markets cloakmakers and dressmakers are combined in same joint board. The joint boards negotiate agreements for entire membership with employers' associations and with individual employers.

In New York City the administrative board of the dress industry represents five employers' associations and is a counterpart of the joint board of dress and waist makers. The scores of needle trade's employer's associations follow narrow craft line like the unions, and coincide with the markets.

Impartial chairman for an industry in a given market is chosen and paid by the union and the employers' association. He is the final arbiter in disputes, although the procedure varies slightly from market to market. The impartial chairman is chosen not so much for his knowledge of the industry as for his ability as an arbitrator, e. g., Charles Poletti, Hon. James J. Walker, Harry Hopkins, etc.

The post of impartial chairman was informally set up in 1910 with the committee of negotiators that issued the Protocols of Peace for the cloak industry, and formally set up in 1924; for the New York dress industry the post was set up in 1930.

Stability and industrial peace

The industry which in its early history was characterized by numerous long and violent strikes is at present known for its continued amicable relations between union and employers. In some instances agreements run for 5-year periods.

At the twenty-fifth convention of the ILGWU in 1944 the harmonious relations between labor and management were attested by the following statements:

"Your organization has been a great stabilizing and constructive force in the ladies' garment industry. It has pointed the way to effective cooperation between labor and management and has successfully improved the conditions of labor in this trade. It has been a pioneer in its enlightened policy of making public each year an itemized account of its income and disbursements. You have every reason to be proud of the accomplishments under your leadership." (President F. D. Roosevelt, quoted in MLR Reprint No. 1694, p. 1.)

"Coat and suit workers and employers have reached the stage of industrial maturity where it is taken for granted that joint effort is required to assure the growth of the industry. This effort, in turn, requires organization—organization of workers, organization of employers, and joint organization. * * *

"It is not merely important for workers alone that their organization continue to be effective. The country at large benefits from the liberalizing influence which characterizes labor unions.

"The record of the ILGWU encourages us to believe that it will continue to be sensitive to the larger responsibilities it has acquired by virtue of becoming one of the great labor organizations of the country." (Alexander Printz, Chairman of National Coat and Suit Recovery Board, and head of Printz-Biederman Co., in Cleveland, quoted in MLR, op. cit., p. 2.)

"This record of industrial peace has not been all a one-way affair; the leaders of our industry, with but few exceptions, have cooperated with the union in keeping labor-employer relations on a balanced keel." (ILGWU General Executive Board Report, quoted in MLR, op. cit., p. 2.)

EXHIBIT 5 [a]

EMPLOYER ORGANIZATIONS AND THE EXTENT OF THEIR PARTICIPATION IN MULTICOMPANY COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

The simplest form of employer-group bargaining sometimes raises the most perplexing problems of identification. In a given city a number of bakers, aware of their ineffectiveness in bargaining separately with unions of their employees, meet informally to discuss the terms of a proposed labor contract. They agree upon a common policy to be followed during the stages of contract negotiation, whether they collectively bargain with the union or not, and even though each employer signs a separate contract. Once the contract becomes effective, collaboration among employers may cease until the time for a renewal of the contract.

The evidences of these collective efforts among employers are not easy to detect. The contracts signed with employees may contain no reference whatever to employer group action. An actual example occurred in Baltimore where five tugboat owners and operators met informally to negotiate contracts with unions represented among their employees. The owners adopted no common name and created no formal organization. After discussing proposed wages and working conditions among themselves they negotiated an agreement with a committee representing the union. The resulting contracts were identical for each of the five companies. The union ratified them all at a single meeting and each company signed its own contract. Yet no contract contained any evidence of employer-group participation in its formation.[1]

Another example of employer collaboration not readily disclosed from an examination of existing agreements is to be found in the flat glass industry where a single agreement covers an association of "Little Glass" companies, and separate agreements exist with each of the two "Big Glass" companies—Pittsburgh Plate and Libby-Owens-Ford. Yet the two large companies negotiated their contracts jointly, both with the Window Glass Cutters League and with the Federation of Glass, Ceramic and Silica Sand Workers. Although each contract is signed by only one firm, the union agreements are identical for both companies. The two companies even collaborate during the administration of the contract to insure uniform patterns of interpretation; yet there is no evidence in the agreements of any common organization or machinery through which joint action is taken.[2]

Other employers' associations, unlike the informal groups whose members mutually assist one another during the negotiations of contracts, offer more tangible evidence of their existence. They possess a common name, perhaps a constitution and by-laws, sometimes a staff of elected officials and permanent employees. They may hold regular meetings of their membership; they may levy assessments and collect dues; they may be affiliated with a number of other employer groups, and they may be incorporated under State law. Thus the Confectioners Industrial Relations Board, composed of 18 companies in the New York metropolitan area is incorporated under the laws of New York State and its officials include a board of directors, an executive-secretary, a treasurer, and a general counsel. On the other hand, the Puget Sound Shipowners Association is not incorporated, has no fixed dues, holds no regular meetings, but levies special assessments when needed and calls meetings when necessary to consider problems of general concern.

Employers' associations of this type are characterized by their primary concern with problems of labor relations. They are either created expressly for the purpose of collective bargaining or they have come to accept the management of labor problems, including the bargaining function, as their predominant interest. Thus the Affiliated Dress Manufacturers, Inc., which since 1900 has negotiated union contracts in the women's ready-to-wear industry of New York City, was organized, as declared in its certificate of incorporation, for the purposes of promoting conciliation and settling disputes between its employers and employees, and of making, on behalf of its members, agreements with other organizations, including trade agreements with labor unions. Likewise, the Association of Doll Manufacturers in New York City was organized in 1933 to handle the labor relations of its members; and its executive secretary has declared that 90 percent of the association's time is devoted to labor problems. On the west coast, the San Francisco Scrap Iron Dealers Association was organized in 1937, as stated in its agreement of association, for the purpose of "the regulation of labor conditions in the scrap and metal industry" through the joint efforts of its members and "by means of collective bargaining."[3]

Formed to bargain collectively with labor unions, a typical employers' association may fluctuate in its membership from year to year. Generally, refusal to accept a contract negotiated by the employer group is tantamount to withdrawal from the association. Or, having accepted a master contract, a member may resign from the association because of disagreement over the administration of the contract or for other reasons. Notice of resignation is usually adequate to effect a separation, provided the company's financial obligations to the association have been fulfilled. Some associations provide for the expulsion of members as a penalty for violating the contract terms. A number of association contracts specify that the separation of a member from the group does not terminate the obligations of the company to the union under the agreement.[4]

Despite the singularity of their purpose, these employers' associations differ widely in their structure and powers. The constitution of the Doll Manufacturers Association, cited above, places highest authority in a board of directors with an executive secretary acting as general manager. In the Scrap Iron Dealers Association, just referred to, authority is so highly centralized that the association negotiates labor contracts and sends copies to its members with instructions "to conduct all relations with your employees in accordance therewith." Most employers' associations follow trade lines and are to be found in the cities. The Associated Laundry Owners of Greater Kansas City, the Employing Bakers of Cleveland, the Chicago Retail Furniture Dealers Association, the Associated Fur Coat and Trimming Manufacturers, Inc., of New York City, the Cincinnati Printers League, the Associated General Contractors of Omaha—all are examples of local employers' associations with union contracts.

Many city associations of this character have no more than the simplest headquarters—if any; no more than the barest outlines of a permanent organization—if any; no more than one or two full-time employees—if any. In many cases their work as an association ceases momentarily with the signing of the contract, even though the association be an indisputable party to it. Like the informal employer groups, many associations remain dormant between negotiating periods. An example is that of the molders and foundrymen of Pittsburgh and vicinity which is an association of foundry and machine shop employers created in 1903 to bargain with the International Molders and Foundry Workers Union. Yet this body has never had a constitution, bylaws, articles of association, nor permanent records. It has never collected dues nor maintained a treasury. It holds no meetings save for those of its negotiating committee and exercises no compulsory powers over its members.[5]

The amount of organization generally varies directly with the strength of the association; and association strength depends in part upon the ratio of actual to eligible membership in the area covered by the agreements. The strongest local associations are generally those with the largest percentage of eligible members over a city-wide or metropolitan area. A newspaper publishers' association with only a few members is likely to be powerful because these associations generally represent most if not all of the newspaper publishing business in their respective metropolitan areas; whereas, a laundry owners' association may be relatively weaker despite the number of its members if, as frequently happens, it represents only one of several such associations in the same city.

An employers' association of the less formal type may be created overnight from a single meeting of employers who select a negotiating committee to bargain with the union. Associations whose only identifying titles are those of their negotiating committees doubtless began operations without the formalities that often accompany the establishment of a new organization. The Fir Employers' Negotiating Committee of Portland, Oregon; the Lumbermen's Industrial Relations Committee of Seattle, Wash.; the Petroleum Labor Group of Minneapolis, Minn.; and the Motor Carriers Negotiating Committee of Nashville, Tenn., were probably created to meet an immediate need in collective bargaining. In December 1945, 13 commercial aviation companies formed the Air Line Negotiating Committee expressly to bargain with the Air Line Pilots Association on the subject of a contract for the pilots of four-engined planes.

The evolution of association bargaining may be illustrated from the experience of the Associated Metal Fabricators and Engineers of Detroit. From 1937 to 1940 several companies engaged in industrial sheet metal work in the Detroit area operated under individual collective bargaining contracts negotiated separately with the United Steelworkers of America. Then for the next 2 years, 1940 to 1942, the United Steelworkers negotiated contracts with a group of from 6 to 9 firms designated in the resulting blanket contracts as sheet metal companies. In December 1942, these companies who were parties to the blanket agreement formed the Associated Metal Fabricators and Engineers; and thereafter the secretary of the association represented the members in the negotiation of labor contracts.[6]

At the formative stage of an employers' association the question of representation is most likely to become a stumbling block. For in many instances the members of the association will most certainly be of unequal size and importance; and they are likely to be too numerous for all to be represented directly at the conference table. In the flat glass industry, for example, the two large companies with 15,000 employees have refrained from joining an association of five smaller companies whose combined workers number only 2,500. The Radio Corporation of America with 8,000 employees negotiates its own contracts with the United Electrical workers (CIO) while in the same industry 20 members of the Electronics Manufacturers' Association have a contract with the same union covering 6,000 employees. The Big Four meat packers in Chicago negotiate individual contracts while the Packers Association of Chicago representing 11 other companies negotiates an association contract covering less than one-tenth as many workers.[7]

The membership of an employers' association is not always drawn from a major industry or trade group. Some associations cut across trade lines; others are confined to narrow crafts within a single major industry or service. Often the character of membership is determined by the particular union with which the association must deal. An association formed to bargain with the Upholsterers' International Union would normally be confined to members of the upholstered furniture industry; and such is the case with the members of the Minneapolis Retail Upholstering Employers Association or with the Upholstered Furniture and Frame Manufacturers Association of Philadelphia. But an association formed to bargain, for example, with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers may be composed of employing upholsterers, milk distributors, ice manufacturers, and meat dealers, all of whom are faced

But notice of resignation from the agreement amounts to resignation from the association, according to the contract between the Los Angeles County Painters and Decorators Joint Committee and the District Council of Painters No. 26. An example of the instability of some employer groups occurred in the fall of 1946 during the general trucking strike in New York City. Two organizations of employers—the Motor Carriers Association and the State Motor Truck Association—had created a joint wage scale committee to negotiate with the teamsters' union. On October 21, 1946, after several large chain stores had broken away from the group, representatives of 80 trucking companies which remained loyal to their associations met and signed cards expressly authorizing the joint wage scale committee to negotiate for them. It was reported that financial penalties were to be imposed upon those who violated their pledges. Subsequently, the joint wage scale committee was dissolved and the members relieved of their pledges. Individual contracts were then signed with the teamsters' union.—New York Times, October 22, 1946, p. 28; October 29, 1946, p. 21.

The New Orleans Steamship Association, Inc., under the laws of the State of Louisiana, August 12, 1912, was preceded by an informal organization known as the New Orleans Steamship Conference. (Report of the Maritime Labor Board, March 1, 1940, p. 95.) In the commercial aviation industry 18 companies formed the Air Lines Negotiating Conference in August 1946 after several months' experience with the Air Lines Negotiating Committee which represented 13 companies. with the problem of delivery service.[8] It is therefore possible for a single company or firm to be a member of several employer groups each of which bargains with one or more unions.

In the needle, printing, and construction trades, employers' associations, like unions, tend to follow narrow craft lines. The apparel industry is noted for the number and diversity of its associations. In New York City alone there are scores of employers' associations in the needle trades, covering such specialties as the manufacturers of bathrobes, corsets, and brassieres, popular priced dresses, women's hats, infants and children's coats, covered buttons, artificial flowers, buttonholes, ladies' handbags, gloves and sportswear. Associations in the printing trades are divided into newspaper publishers, book publishers, edition bookbinders, employing printers, electrotypers, photoengravers, stereotypers, lithographers, and others.

The construction trades have a host of employers' associations in almost ever large city where workers are organized along craft lines. In some cities the divisions are more finely drawn than in others. Examples are the Painting and Decorating Contractors of Cleveland, the Master Plasterers of Boston, the Contracting Plumbers of St. Louis, the Heating, Piping, and Air Conditioning Contractors of Greater New York, the Associated Metal Fabricators and Engineers of Detroit, and the Mason Contractors of St. Louis. However, the Builders Guild of St. Louis represents principally but not exclusively the general contractors; and in Seattle, Wash., the Seattle Construction Council is a general employers association covering many branches of the construction trades, just as the local A. F. of L. Building and Construction Trades Council with which the association bargains, embraces a number of unions of employees in the construction trades.

There is substantial evidence that employers' associations tend to follow the pattern of the union organization with which they deal. In California where more than a dozen local unions of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers are organized into a highway drivers council, the employers have a corresponding organization for collective bargaining in the Truck Owners Association of California. In San Francisco, where local unions of bartenders, waitresses, cooks, waiters, dairy lunchmen, and miscellaneous employees are associated in a joint executive board of culinary workers and bartenders, some 50 employers representing hotels, lunchrooms, restaurants, bars, and grills have organized the San Francisco Culinary Employers Conference. A single contract is negotiated between the two bodies. Again the Plumbing, Heating, and Piping Employers Council of Southern California holds a contract with the Southern District Council of the California Pipe Trades Council which represents the employees.

In the Midwest, the Central States Drivers Council, an organ of 330 locals in the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, negotiates contracts with the Central States Employers' Negotiating Committee representing some 800 common and contract carriers in 12 States.[9] In Indiana where several unions are affiliated in a Federal Council of Limestone Trades, their employers negotiate with them through the Stone Industry Industrial Relations Committee of the Indiana Limestone Institute.

The problem of transporting supplies in the construction industry of Pennsylvania has produced a State-wide contract negotiated between the Pennsylvania State Council of Building Contractors and the Pennsylvania Commercial Drivers Conference. In the vicinity of Boston, Mass., the Building Trades Employers Association of Boston and vicinity and the Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts jointly negotiate contracts with the General Laborers Local Unions of the Eastern Massachusetts Laborers District Council.

The retail and wholesale trades sometimes provide the basis for general employers' associations whose contracts are distinguished by the number of trade groups embraced and by the number of unions involved. Thus the Merchant Employers' Association of Anaconda, Mont., which bargains with the Retail Clerks' Protective Association, has a membership representing grocery, drug, shoe, clothing, furniture, and variety stores as well as general merchandising. In Toledo, Ohio, Retail Associates, another merchants association, has a single contract with 13 different union signatories. Since 1939, the Pittsburgh Labor Standards Association composed of five of the six major department stores in the city has negotiated contracts for its members with 21 different unions. One contract alone covers 12,000 sales employees.[10]

In many cities, employers' associations, like the unions with which they deal, have formed local federations to provide a medium of cooperation among different branches of the same trade or among various trade groups. These federations are more common among associations organized along narrow craft lines within the same industry or trade group. But there may still be an additional need for common counsel on labor problems among all employers within the city, inasmuch as labor disputes in one firm or business invariably affect conditions in other trades or industries. General federations of employer groups also facilitate the adoption of basic labor policies to be promoted by management throughout the locality.

Such federations, like their component members, may be nameless or titled, simple or complex, temporary or permanent. In some cases the only evidence is the existence of a contract covering a number of associations in the same city. Thus four brewery associations in Chicago—the Illinois Association of Breweries, the Wholesale Beer Distributors Association, the Associated Chicago Beer Distributors, and the Out-of-State Shipping Brewers—have jointly accepted common contracts with the Beer and Liquor Chauffeurs and Helpers, Local No. 714, of the teamsters' union. One contract applicable to all four associations covers the bottle-beer drivers; another covers the keg-beer drivers. In the same city three contractors' associations in the construction industry have a joint agreement with local No. 73 of the sheet-metal workers; four laundry associations have practically identical contracts with local No. 712 of the teamsters; three dress manufacturers' associations have common contracts with the Chicago Joint Board of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union; and three trucking associations have an agreement with several locals of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.[11]

In Detroit, the Greater Detroit Movers Association, the Detroit Van Owners Association, and the Detroit Furniture Warehousemen's Association have set up a common labor relations committee which negotiates contracts applicable to all three associations with local No. 243 of the teamsters' union. In the San Francisco Bay area, six painting and decorating contractors' associations have created the Bay Area Painters and Decorators Joint Committee, Inc., which negotiates contracts with several locals and district councils of the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers. Still another example of a negotiating committee representing more than one association was the joint agency representing the Motor Carriers Association of New York and the State Motor Truck Association which bargained with the teamsters before and during the trucking strike in New York City (September to October 1946).[12]

Local federations of employers' associations are common in the clothing industry, where the term "board" or "council" in the title of an employer group usually identifies the organization as a federation of associations, just as these words in labor union terminology usually signify a combination of union locals. The administrative board of the dress industry, for example, represents five employers' associations in New York City and is a counterpart to the local joint board of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union with which most association contracts in the apparel industry are negotiated. Another typical federation of employers' associations is found in the silk and rayon dyeing and finishing industry of New York City and vicinity. In 1943 seven employers' associations in this area formed a central bargain-

[12] In Seattle, Wash., Local Union No. 105 of the Retail Clerks' International Protective Association has identical contracts, except for a few clauses covering job classifications and salaries, with five local employers' associations: Retail druggists, retail drug distributors, retail food industries, retail grocers and meat dealers, and the bakers. In addition, other copies of the agreement are prepared as form contracts for department stores, shoe stores, and variety stores. In the same city, Local No. 44 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters has identical contracts, except for job classifications and salaries, with the Automobile Supply and Equipment Association, the Automobile Dealers Association, the Kings County Tire Dealers Association, and the service stations.

ing council which negotiates contracts with the unions for its member associations.[13]

Although many associations which otherwise maintain their independence have since VJ-day joined informally to work out common policies on wage increases, federations of employers' associations are not a recent development; nor were they a strikingly unusual institution prior to the war production drives of the 1940's and the NRA codes. More than 40 years ago the Building Trades Employers' Association of New York City represented 30 employers' associations in handling labor problems for the construction industry. This it did through the medium of a board of governors consisting of three members from each association.[14]

In 1946 this association negotiated with the Building and Construction Trades Council a contract which applied to 19 employers' associations and 26 union groups. These member associations covered 19 different branches of the construction industry. They included such associations of employers as the Asbestos Contractors; the Master Carpenters; the Window and Plate Glass Dealers; the Contracting Plumbers; the Composition Roofers, Waterproofers and Dampproofers; the Heating, Piping, and Air Conditioning Contractors; and the Master League of Cement Workers. These trades associations each have contracts with their corresponding unions; but the master contract of the Building Trades Employers' Association set basic standards which superseded conflicting provisions in the existing contracts of the member associations. Each association is encouraged, however, to continue its contracts supplementing the master agreement.[15]

Employer-group federations embracing all types of business within a city are largely a development of the last 10 years and are primarily concentrated in the far Western States. Leader in this field is the San Francisco Employers Council, which in April of 1945 had 1,995 members, 919 of whom were affiliated through their various industry groups. The other members were individuals or independent companies. The objectives of the council, as stated in its articles of incorporation, are (1) to encourage the organization of autonomous employer groups and cooperation among these groups in matters relating to labor relations; (2) "to promote the recognition and exercise of the right of employers to bargain collectively;" and (3) upon request, "to assist its members and others in matters relating to the negotiation, execution, and performance of fair labor contracts." During its first year of service the council negotiated 106 contracts, adjusted 67 labor complaints, handled 8 arbitration cases, filled 295 separate requests for advice, and provided 48 special services. In its 1944 annual report the council noted that its members had made increasing use of its facilities and services.[16]

Of a similar character is the Industrial Conference Board of Tacoma, Wash., an over-all agency for a number of independent companies and 15 or 20 employers' associations each of which has one or more union agreements. Both the Reno Employers Council of Reno, Nev., and the Silver Bow Employers Association of Butte, Mont., participate in the formation of labor contracts for their various employer groups. In Sacramento, Calif., the Sacramento Valley Associated Industries is the unifying agency for a dozen or more associations covering such varied fields as bowling alleys, beverages, furniture warehouses, taxicabs, machine shops, liquor and tobacco dealers, retail foods, wholesale bakeries, draymen, druggists, tire dealers, and building owners. Each association has a union contract signed in its behalf by the individual who serves both as executive secretary to the association and as general managers of the Associated Industries.[17]

Many forms of employers' associations found in cities and metropolitan areas are duplicated in associations with a larger area of coverage. There are intrastate district associations, like the Southeastern Massachusetts Shoe Manufacturers Association, the Food Industry of Western New York, and the Plumbing, Heating and Piping Employers Council of Southern California. There are State-wide associations like the Timber Producers Association of Minnesota, the Montana Contractors Association, or the Indiana Coal Operators Association. There are interstate regional associations like the Pacific Coast Association of Pulp and Paper Manufacturers, the Great Lakes Sand Boat Operators, or the Southeastern States group of motor-carrier operators. Finally, there are a limited number of national associations with industry-wide contracts like the Wall Paper Institute, the United States Potters Association, and the National Elevator Manufacturing industry, Inc.[18]

There is a tendency for the geographic scope of association bargaining to gravitate toward areas of keenest competition among employers. Most commonly this area is a metropolitan district. Owners of hotels, laundries, groceries, and other service establishments seldom compete with other members in their respective trade groups beyond the limits of the metropolitan area in which their business is located. An increasing number of association contracts cover a greater city or a city and vicinity. Such are the contracts of the Union Foundrymen of Pittsburgh and Vicinity, the Retail Furniture Dealers Association of Greater Cincinnati, or the Sacramento Automotive Associations in the Sacramento Metropolitan Trading Area.[19]

The tendency for collective bargaining to coincide with "markets" accounts for the prevalence of regional associations which follow areas of economic rather than political interest. Western Pennsylvania has its regional associations of contractors, motor carriers, and beer distributors. Northern California has its foundrymen's institute, its retail druggists, and its chapter of the Electrical Contractors Association. In the coal industry associations follow the valleys. In the apparel industry they follow the leading apparel-producing cities and their supporting hinterlands. The Merchants Ladies Garments Association defines the "Metropolitan district" embraced by its contract with the International Ladies Garment Workers as "the city of New York and all such cities and towns in the State of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania in which garments are being manufactured by or for members of the association or other manufacturers, jobbers, or wholesalers doing business in New York City."[20]

For the same reasons martime and longshore associations on the Atlantic and Gulf coast are separate from those on the Great Lakes or the Pacific coast. The Pacific American Shipowners Association, for example, is composed of 30 or 40 shipping companies whose home ports are on the Pacific coast, and it has a series of deep-sea agreements with the National Organization of Masters, Mates, and Pilots (AFL); the National Marine Engineers Beneficial Association, Pacific Coast Division (CIO); the National Union of Marine Cooks and Stewards (CIO); the American Communications Association, Marine Division (CIO); the Sailors Union of the Pacific (AFL); and the Pacific Coast Marine Firemen, Oilers, Watertenders, and Wipers Association (Independent). It also has separate coastwise agreements with each of these six unions for vessels in the steamer-schooner trade. These agreements are in no way tied up with similar contracts negotiated through the Committee for Companies and Agents, Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

Often it is as difficult to identify association bargaining on a regional basis as on a local one. Here, too, there are many "form" contracts applicable to all employers in certain States or regions who will accept them either by signing individually (a separate contract for each employer) or in groups (several signatories to a single document). Here, too, it is not always clear whether the [17] Employers' councils are an outgrowth from the older city-wide associated industries which were often hostile to organized labor. See the 250-page report on the Associated Industries of Cleveland, 76th Cong., 1st sess., S. Rept. No. 6, pt. 5. This is a part of the La Follette committee report on Violations of Free Speech and the Rights of Labor, which deals extensively with the labor policies of the older type of employers' associations. The Employers Association of Detroit, whose members embrace all manufacturing groups, most of which are in the automobile industry, has since its formation in 1902 collected and disseminated information on labor relations for its members, but does not negotiate contracts. William H. McPherson, Labor Relations in the Automobile Industry (1940), pp. 13–14.

[18] Some association agreements are national in their geographic scope but not industry-wide in their coverage. Thus the 35 hosiery companies covered by the 1946–47 agreement between the Full Fashioned Hosiery Manufacturers of America and the American Federation of Hosiery Workers are scattered from Massachusetts to California, but they represent only about 35 percent of the full-fashioned hosiery industry. The Manufacturers' Protective and Development Association has a contract with the International Molders and Foundry Workers Union which covers less than 25 percent of the industry, although the member companies are scattered throughout the country.

[19] The Sacramento groups of employers consist of 16 automobile dealers, 10 body, fender, and welder shops, 11 parts houses, 2 brake shops, and 40 automotive-maintenance concerns. They have a contract with the Sacramento Automotive Trades Council, which includes the International Association of Machinists and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

[20] Everywhere collective bargaining tends to follow expanding areas of competition in business. In the textile industry of New England the employer basis for bargaining has grown from the company to the association to combinations of associations. In 1945 the New Bedford Cotton Manufacturers Association and the Fall River Manufacturers Association negotiated a joint agreement with the United Textile Workers of America. Another group composing the Textile Directive Steering Committee represents 29 New England cotton and rayon companies operating 40 mills and employing 31,000 people. In re The Textile Directive Steering Committee, etc. (November 19, 1945) (28 War Labor Reports 738 at 739).

employers accepting these blanket agreements are acting as members of an association or as independent companies. Many regional groups are loosely organized with little more than a negotiating committee to represent them. Such is the Committee for Companies and Agents, Atlantic and Gulf Coasts, which, in October 1946, negotiated coastwise maritime agreements with the National Organization of Masters, Mates, and Pilots (AFL), and the National Maritime Marine Engineers Beneficial Association (CIO).[21] Such also is the Southeastern Area Employers Negotiating Committee, representing common, contract, and private carriers by motortruck, which negotiates contracts with the southeastern area union negotiating committee of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers.

Employers in some branches of the construction trades sign identical form contracts of State-wide or national application. An Indiana blanket agreement was drafted to govern the employment relations of the International Union of Operating Engineers with the "signatory" contractors in the State. One copy of this agreement has been signed by representatives of 20 different companies, who, by the terms of the contract, are directed to name one of the three members to a joint grievance board. Some means for collective action among employers is therefore required to fulfill the obligations of the contract, whatever may have been its origin or the intention of those who framed it. In Montana, there exists a form contract defined as an agreement "between the employers of granite cutters in the State of Montana and the Montana branches of the Granite Cutters International Association of America."

A Nation-wide blanket agreement exists between the sheet metal contracting division of the construction industry and the Sheet Metal Workers International Association. One space is provided for inserting the name of the contractor or contractors' association, party to the agreement; another, for defining the territory covered by the agreement. A similar 1946 blanket contract between the Master Insulators Association and the International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers is prepared for use throughout the country by having the appropriate parties insert their titles in the following clause of the contract: "This agreement, made and entered into this —— day of ——— 19—, by and between the Master Insulator Association of ———— and vicinity as party of the first part and International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators and Asbestos Workers' Local No. ——— of ——— as party of the second part."[22]

[21] This employers' negotiating group was first organized during the war as a committee for the general agents of the War Shipping Administration, Atlantic and Gulf coasts. It was the negotiated coastwise agreements with the National Maritime Union (CIO) and the American Communications Association (CIO) as well as the National Organization of Masters, Mates, and Pilots (AFL) and the National Marine Beneficial Association (CIO). While most of the companies represented by this committee are also members of the American Merchant Marine Institute, and although the president of the institute is at the same time chairman of the negotiating group, the committee is not a creature of the institute. Letter dated February 3, 1947, from William G. Mullins, director of labor relations, American Merchant Marine Institute, to Ewan Clague, United States Commissioner of Labor Statistics.)

[22] Apprenticeship training has also been a subject of Nation-wide bargaining between national associations of employers and international craft unions in the construction trades. Thus, in June 1946 the National Terrazzo and Mosaic Association, Inc., and the Bricklayers, Masons and Plasterers International Union of America signed a national apprentice agreement, the terms of which have already been accepted by the Chicago Terrazzo and Mosaic Contractors Association in a contract with local No. 41 of the Marble Mosaic and Terrazzo Workers Union. Again, the National Joint Carpentry Apprenticeship Committee, in cooperation with the Federal Committee on Apprenticeship, prepared the National Standards for Carpentry Apprenticeship, which were approved by the Associated General Contractors of America, the National Association of Building Trades Employers, and the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners (AFL) in 1941. These national standards were made a part of the current agreement between the Building Construction Employers Association of Chicago and the Chicago and Cook County Building and Construction Trades Council.

The larger the area of coverage the more likely is an association to operate through local or district agencies each of which may exercise some particular function in the conduct of labor relations. The Waterfront Employers Association of the Pacific Coast embraces employers of longshoremen handling general cargo along the entire west coast; but the work of the association is carried on through affiliated local waterfront employers associations in Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, and San Pedro (Los Angeles). Each of these associations has its own port agreements covering certain workers who are members of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union. The coastwise longshore agreement is negotiated by the Waterfront Employers Association of the Pacific Coast "on behalf of" these four local associations.[23] In the bituminous-coal industry, employers' associations are pyramided from a broad base of local associations covering a county or a valley up through district associations, some of which are State-wide, to regional associations, like the Appalachian Coal Operators, representing 21 district associations, or the Southern Coal Producers Association, composed of 14 district associations and 4 individual members.[24] At the apex of this pyramid of coal associations in the last few years has been the temporary negotiating committees, representing the entire industry in bargaining for contract revisions with the United Mine Workers of America.

National employers' associations are usually at the head of complex association "systems," with units of their organizations extending down through States and districts into localities. These systems differ widely in their distribution of responsibility for conducting labor relations at the various levels of authority. The National Association of Retail Meat Dealers, with headquarters in Chicago, is, by the terms of its current contract with the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of America, recognized to be "a national association of retail meat dealers consisting of affiliated State and local associations in various cities and States of the United States." This national agreement, first negotiated in 1937, does not establish a high degree of centralization in the association system, however; for in article I of the agreement, "both parties recognize that local conditions require local treatment and that it is not practical or feasible to include in this agreement the matters of wages, hours, and conditions of employment." The national agreement is therefore confined to a statement of principles and policies of mutual interest to both parties, who agree to "give their aid and good offices to the execution of fair and reasonable contracts between local unions and affiliated associations in the various localities where the said unions and affiliated associations exist."

In the building industry the Associated General Contractors of America is a national organization with State and local chapters, each of which may be a party to a labor contract. In 1942, for example, the Arizona General Contractors negotiated with the building and construction trade-unions a State-wide agreement which was signed for the employers by the secretary of the Arizona chapter of the Associated General Contractors of America and for the unions by a representative of the Building and Construction Trades Department of the A. F. of L. Twenty-four contractors and 17 different union groups also signed the contract. Intrastate chapters of the national association hold similar contracts—some, like that of the Southern California General Contractors, are district-wide; others, like that of the Portland, Oreg., chapter are local.[25]

The National Master Plumbers Association and the Heating, Piping, and Air Conditioning Contractors National Association have a common agreement with the United Association of Journeymen Plumbers and Steamfitters of America which states that it "may be used as a national guide for the local associations, and/or unions of both parties in negotiating their particular local agreement." This national agreement sets minimum wages and working conditions for all construction and repair work of the association in the United States and Canada, "it being understood that local groups of both parties will negotiate any higher hourly wage rate and overtime rate other than the minimum rate herein provided for."

Other industries and services have similar federated employer-group systems whose various echelons contribute directly or indirectly to collective bargaining and the maintenance of industrial peace. The American Trucking Association with headquarters in Washington, D. C., claims 40,000 members organized into 55 State and local associations. Numerous contracts of regional, State, and local coverage are now in effect with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. The Industrial Council of Cloak, Suit, and Skirt Manufacturers, Inc., which bargains with the local joint board of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, covers a number of associations in New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania; yet the council is only one of four major coat and suit industry associations which are members of the National Coat and Suit Industry Recovery Board. A recent development in the apparel industry on a still more comprehensive scale has been the creation of a National Federation of Apparel Associations, the purpose of which, as stated by its general manager, is "to effect a greater affiliation between trade associations in the apparel industry so that they will be able to act together and speak with one voice regarding matters of common interest."[26]

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE JOHN B. POWELL

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the remarks which I am about to make are submitted on behalf of my colleague the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] and for myself.

On February 28, 1947, at a luncheon meeting of Missouri University Alumni held in Washington, D. C., the guest of honor voiced the view that there is no need for us to fight Russia in the near future, if at all, if we take advantage of our common friendship and common grounds. He presented also the proposition that the Pacific islands that form a protective screen for America should never be relinquished. He set forth the fact that there are three ideologies at work in Asia, namely, communism, imperialism, and the American democratic idea, and expressed the view that what happens to China, India, to a billion people, will depend on the attitude and action of the United States. He expressed the hope that our national leadership has the intelligence to maintain our position in the Orient, and will exercise that intelligence in the years to come. He further declared that events in Asia will be of supreme importance in the future. The words of the speaker were based upon a wealth of knowledge which he possessed from a quarter of a century spent in the Far East.

Startlingly soon after the conclusion of his address, and while yet seated at the head table of the luncheon meeting, he whose words had just been uttered collapsed. Within a few moments he had passed to "the undiscover'd country from whose bourn no traveller returns."

The speaker was John B. Powell, Missouri born, graduate of the University of Missouri School of Journalism, newspaper man in Hannibal, Mo., for 3 years, instructor for 4 years at the university of which he was a son, and subsequently editor, foreign correspondent, and author. In 1917, Mr. Powell became connected with Millard's Far Eastern Review in Shanghai, China. Subsequently he bought the publication and changed its name to China Weekly Review. He was editor and publisher of it at the time of his death, having served in those capacities for many years, though his son, J. W. Powell, had been its managing editor since the resumption of publication in 1945 following the war. The publication had been suspended since Pearl Harbor. Among the products of the authorship of John B. Powell is the work entitled "My Twenty-five Years in China."

In his career in the Far East Mr. Powell was notably distinguished by his clear perception of the designs of Japan upon China and by his courageous and persistent warning to the world that the Japanese possessed such intentions. In an editorial entitled "He Being Dead Yet Speaketh," the Kansas City Times said:

As managing editor of the China Weekly Review at Shanghai, John Powell early showed a real understanding of Chinese character and a comprehension of Japanese plans to establish an overlordship in China. For many years he was a voice crying in the wilderness, warning his countrymen against the danger of the conflict he so clearly saw impending.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat said of him:

He was one of the first who saw the menace of Japanese aggression and was outspoken in his condemnation.

The New York Times declared:

Soon convinced that Japan intended to swallow China, he made it his mission to warn the world. Threats, bribe offers, and bombing never swerved him.

The Louisville, Ky., Courier-Journal said:

John Powell's voice in the China press was just one man's, but it kept crying in the wilderness of the Orient, crying out against Japanese aggression.

His outspoken, daring, and repeated announcement to the world of the plans of Japan caused it to be likely that he would be a victim of the hatred and cruelty of that empire. The likelihood was to become a certainty. Less than 2 weeks after Pearl Harbor he was incarcerated by the Japanese in Bridgehouse Prison which at once aroused in him the thought of the Black Hole of Calcutta. In this prison he spent 7 months. He experienced the loss of two-fifths of his weight and the freezing and gangrene of his feet. Ultimately, as a result of his prison experience he suffered the loss of one foot and much of the other. As he spoke to his fellow alumni on the day of his death he stood on crutches and artificial feet.

The Washington Post said that he "wrote with clarity and pungency, but his prime virtue was courage." Continuing, the Post said:

A man of some means, he could have left the Far East when the overrunning of China by the Japanese was foreseen by most China hands, let alone an acute observer like Powell. But he stuck to his post.

The Washington Evening Star pointed out that after the Japanese moved into Manchuria in September 1931, "every agency of the Jap Government joined in a concerted effort to remove Mr. Powell from the Orient." Continuing the Star article reads:

His publications were denied postal privileges. His cable messages were mercilessly slashed by Jap censors and he was showered with threatening letters.

Nevertheless, the fighting editor wrote a series of stories for the Chicago Tribune dealing with Japan's preparations for war in 1934 and 1935.

Mr. Powell died among University of Missouri alumni. It was appropriate that it was among them that his final message was delivered, for he possessed an abiding affection for his alma mater. His courageous and steadfast adherence to duty vividly brings to our minds the words from a song of that great university:

Old Missouri, fair Missouri, dear old varsity,
Ours are hearts that fondly love thee,
Here's a health to thee.
Proud art thou in classic beauty
Of thy noble past.
With thy watchwords, honor, duty,
Thy high fame shall last.

Mr. President, although a copy of the remarks made by Mr. Powell as the concluding public message of his life does not exist, there has been reconstructed from notes and recollections a statement which is thought to be a close approximation of what he said on that notable occasion. I ask unanimous consent that, at the conclusion of my remarks, that statement be set forth in full.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of Mr. DONNELL'S remarks.

Mr. DONNELL. I also ask unanimous consent that following the statement just mentioned there may be set forth the following editorials from the Washington Post; the Louisville Courier-Journal; the Kansas City Times; the St. Louis Globe-Democrat; the New York Times; the China Daily News (Shanghai), March 3, 1947; the China Press (Shanghai), March 2, 1947.

There being no objection the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, to his surviving widow, his son, his daughter—Mrs. Martha Hensley, his brother, sisters, and friends, may there come consolation from the beautiful words of the paragraph with which is concluded the editorial, just mentioned, from the China Press of Shanghai:

May the earth lie softly above your head J. B. This is the beginning of a long sleep. But your work will be carried on. For you make truth nobler—a more fearless thing. And as long as truth will survive so too will your memory.

TALK BY JOHN B. POWELL, DISTINGUISHED EDITOR AND AUTHOR, ON FAR EASTERN AFFAIRS TO UNIVERSITY OF MISSOURI ALUMNI, AT SHERATON HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D. C., FEBRUARY 28, 1947

Mr. Chairman (Clark Nichols, Missouri, '06), fellow alumni, and guests, I have come here today, at the invitation of your chairman and of my classmate, Roy Miller (Missouri, '10), who has introduced me so extravagantly, to talk to you of something of the significance of events in the Far East. To do that I will comment from my long-time experiences there, dating back to 1917.

(NOTE.—John B. Powell had been presented to the University of Missouri alumni as the "most apt to be known from the Yukon's frosty peaks to Rio's Corcovado and in the bazars of far Cathay as well as here in the old U. S. A."

(A notice by Clark Nichols, president of the Washington, D. C., branch of the University of Missouri Alumni Association, in announcing the speaking date said, "This modest little man, whom everyone stood to honor at the luncheon in honor of Senator JAMES P. KEM on January 30, has become, because of his long years of service in China as managing editor of the China Weekly Review and correspondent for the Chicago Tribune, his dodging of Japanese assassins, his services as war correspondent, and as author of My Twenty-five Years in China and other books on the Far East, the University of Missouri's most famed graduate of this era.")

Reference has been made to My Twenty-five Years in China, and it has been said that I am most familiar with affairs in China. What I am really most familiar with at the present time is plastic surgery. At present, I am becoming accustomed to my new feet, one of them courtesy the Press Club, and the other courtesy the Army.

I am especially glad today to see here two longtime friends, James R. Young of the International News Service and Morris J. Harris (Missouri '25) of the Associated Press. We share a like distinction in that all three of us have served in Japanese jails. In my own case, I was thrown into Bridgehouse Prison by the Japanese on December 20, 1941.

In historic retrospect, I want to emphasize the importance of China and the Far East to the United States economically, in the past as well as for the future. Although the United States fought largely in the Pacific, as a Nation we know less about the Far East than in the days of the clipper ships. After the American Revolution, our trade and commerce with China and the Far East brought this country out of an economic depression.

For an illustration, it was not uncommon of New England sea captains to cut a shipload of ice in the winter season, and sell it in the Far East and in China. As a historical landmark to such trading, there is an Icehouse Street in Hong Kong today.

China is in much the same position as we were a century ago. She will eventually regain her outlying possessions, as we won the West. Primarily it is a case of transportation. It was not until we extended our railroads to the Coast that we could be sure of our land. We built the railroads, at terrible cost, but if we had not, the Pacific Coast would not have been ours, but would have been British and Spanish, and perhaps Russian.

For the next decades China, with only 10,000 miles of railroads, against our 260,000 in a smaller country, will have to extend her communications. Then Manchuria, Mongolia, and Sinkiang, a territory in itself as large as the United States, will be restored to her.

There are three ideologies at work in Asia—communism, imperialism, and the American democratic idea. What happens to China, India, to a billion people * * * will depend on the attitude and action of the United States.

Shall we be left in a world with more than a billion hostile people against our quarter million in the Western Hemisphere?

Once when there was a Presidential election we got a cable, through the same channel, "Harding leading in early returns."

"There will be later reports," I told the English owner of the paper. He wanted to know why there should be. I told him that the States are far-flung, and that reports trickle in gradually till the election was no longer in doubt.

"Do you mean they wait for reports from the interior?" he asked.

"Yes, from the various States, Missouri, for instance."

"Missouri?" replied the boss. "Missouri? Is that one of the Indian reservations?"

As for Missourians, you see them everywhere, at home and abroad. I well remember one visit to Dallas, where there are more Missourians than Texans.

At a gathering of Missouri alumni, such as this one, someone had prepared a long list of illustrious Missourians. After the list was read, someone else pointed out a noted omission, of a man who had influenced business, railroads, and economics, perhaps more than almost any other.

When no one could supply the name of this man, he who had called attention to the omission finally said Jesse James.

In a discussion of far-eastern affairs today, my mind turns back to 1921. At that time, after 3 years as Chicago Tribune correspondent in China, I was back in this country. I called on my boss, Col. Robert R. McCormick, then as now the editor and publisher of the Tribune.

He asked me if there was anything I especially wanted to do, and I replied that I wanted to interview Warren Gamaliel Harding, then newly elected President, but still at his home, at Marion, Ohio. He arranged for me to call on President-elect Harding at Marion for the interview. At his Marion home, President Harding invited him there on a number of occasions.

It was one of my assignments to cover the Disarmament Conference, with Charles Evans Hughes presiding, when discussion of the Pacific problem was high on the agenda. Today, we are still making peace in the Pacific after World War II.

I was forcibly reminded of this when in Tokyo recently for the war crimes trials. A young attorney on the staff, from Kansas City—I believe his name was Brooks—was discussing far eastern problems. He said that the more he studied the situation today and compared it with his historical knowledge of the developments after World War I, that he was impressed that "the situation has not changed much—only the actors have changed." I have reflected many times since on the fundamental soundness of that judgment.

In the Far East three major political areas are concerned. These include Siberia, a second Canada; Manchuria, Outer and Inner Mongolia, comparable to our Minnesota or Iowa; and China proper. Additionally, there is India.

Our best prospect for future trade is in India, but in order to take full advantage of that market we must maintain the position we hold today in China.

Russia has been in Siberia for three centuries without scratching the surface there. Only in the past 10 or 12 years is Russia building some factories there, for purposes unknown to us.

It was always interesting to ride the trains in Siberia, where the forests grew up so close they scratched the sides of the cars, and it was a common saying it was a battle between man and the trees, and the trees winning. Newsprint is a problem with us today, but there is enough newsprint in Siberia to supply all the papers in the world for a long, long time to come.

It has been stated that Russia has never been successfully invaded, but I remember that we had one division of troops in Siberia at the end of World War I that went everywhere they needed to go. And I can recall Charles Evans Hughes pounding the desk at the 1921 Disarmament Conference to require the Japanese troops there to withdraw.

It had been agreed among the Allied Powers that each would send a division of troops into Siberia as an occupation force, and we had sent our usual division of about 10,000 men, while the Japanese division was 70,000 strong. If we had not run them out, when Charles Evans Hughes cracked down at the Disarmament Conference, they undoubtedly would have stayed on and be there today.

Lesser areas of importance are Korea, the Philippines, Malaya, and the Netherland East Indies.

The Far East is so big you can have a war in one part of it, and the people in another part will not know anything about it.

I once heard Fiorello H. LaGuardia, when mayor of New York, make an address to a group where he was in his element and whose language he spoke—the garment makers. He told them "you had better quit playing pinochle or those fellas in Los Angeles and San Francisco will take your business away from you." In the Far East that holds true for us today.

In the past, we have looked to Europe for significant events. This is largely because of our own background, and roots. We have ignored Asia. We ignore it today in the schools. I remember well, before going to China, how difficult it was to find anything comprehensive and authentic in the schools and libraries, and the situation has not improved much today.

In our country, the Republicans are in control of Congress, as they were in 1921. At that time, after World War I, we wrecked our fighting forces. We thought we could avoid war by throwing away the means of fighting.

The Republicans are in control in our Houses of Congress again today. They have the same responsibility for basic foreign policy decisions that will determine our course and future, and I sincerely hope they, and the Nation have learned something by our experience of the past 25 years.

The Pacific islands that form a protective screen for America should never be relinquished. We could have purchased them for $5,000,000 from Spain after the close of our war with Spain, but we did not want them.

They were subsequently sold to Germany, which owned them until 1914, when the Japs took them. Now, I cannot think of any circumstances, or combination of circumstances, that could cause us to give them up to any nation.

I read in the papers that Russia will not question our control of the Pacific isles. I wonder that Russia, or any other nation, would even think of questioning our control.

The papers have been saying, too, that Lt. Gen. John R. Hodge, our military Governor in Korea, is surprised to find the Russians training a half million Koreans today, but that is no surprise to me, for the Russians were training Koreans at Vladivostok when I was there in 1931.

I hope today that our Nation has increased its vision, and accepts its responsibilities more intelligently than we did 25 years ago. There is no need for a war with Russia unless we scrap our fighting services, and withdraw within ourselves, as we did in the 20's.

Any war fought against Russia would be fought in Siberia, and the atom bomb would be of no use to us in Siberia, in striking at its remote areas and sections, but the atom bomb, used by Russia against us, could do enormous damage by hitting at our population centers and industrial areas. There is no need for us to fight Russia, however, in the near future or at all, if we take advantage of our common friendship and common grounds.

The Orient has been placed on our doorstep, and our national leadership should have the intelligence to maintain our position there. I hope that it has, and exercises that intelligence in the years to come.

After World War I the Far East looked to Europe for trade, commerce, and dominance. Today it looks to the United States for the trade and commerce it got before from Europe.

For in the years to come, and particularly in the next half century, we must cease to regard developments in Europe as of first importance. Developments in Asia will be of more importance. Events in Asia will be of supreme importance in the future.

JOHN B. POWELL

The dramatic death of John Benjamin Powell after a speech he had just delivered to a Washington gathering of his friends will be mourned by newspapermen in America and Asia. Powell was an ornament to the calling of journalism. It was, indeed, a calling to him, not a business or even a profession. Trained at the School of Journalism in his native State of Missouri, he soon after went to China, and bought the China Weekly Review, in which for 20 years he exposed the machinations of militaristic Japan in China. He wrote with clarity and pungency, but his prime virtue was courage. A man of some means, he could have left the Far East when the overrunning of China by the Japanese was foreseen by most China hands, let alone an acute observer like Powell. But he stuck to his post. Inevitably he was thrown into a concentration camp as soon as the Japanese captured Shanghai, and his sufferings were so harrowing that, on his repatriation, his feet were so gangrenous that they had to be amputated. A slight man even in health, he was a mere shadow when he came home, but he had won a moral stature that his colleagues, including the members of the National Press Club, delighted to acknowledge. For months he had been bedridden at Walter Reed Hospital, but his spirit never flagged, nor his interest in world, particularly Far Eastern, affairs. A letter from his pen appearing in our columns as recently as Monday warned Congress against sinking into the same apathy which found us unprepared in the Pacific in 1941. A shining knight of the pen was John B. Powell, and his life and work will be an inspiration to the neophytes of his craft.

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal]

A NEWSPAPERMAN WHO TRIED TO WARN US

John Powell's voice in the China Press was just one man's but it kept crying in the wilderness of the Orient, crying out against Japanese aggression. But from the time of the Manchurian invasion in 1931 until the day of Pearl Harbor a decade later, nobody in the United States listened.

An agent of the pro-Japanese Nanking regime threw a grenade at John Powell one day in October 1941, as he walked the streets of Shanghai. And when the war came, the Japanese quickly captured and imprisoned him. He lived through tortures. But he lost part of each foot from gangrenous infection and starvation. He was an ill man in August 1942, when he was repatriated.

Since then Americans have been more willing to listen to his voice. He was in Washington Friday night telling some of them why United States must keep strong in the Far East, how the occupation of Japan must be long continued. And it was the last warning he ever gave us, because when he sat down at the speakers' table he died of a heart attack. What he had said, of course, was just one man's opinion. But it was the opinion of a man who realized what was happening long before the rest of us did, and who knew what he was talking about. His last warning ought to be heard and understood.

[From the Kansas City Times]

HE BEING DEAD YET SPEAKETH

John B. Powell was a pioneer in that series of fine young newspapermen sent out to the Orient from the University of Missouri School of Journalism under the leadership of the revered Walter Williams. These men made a deep impression on journalism in Japan and China and helped make the university at Columbia a center of interest in current Oriental affairs.

As managing editor of the China Weekly Review at Shanghai, John Powell early showed a real understanding of Chinese character and a comprehension of Japanese plans to establish an overlordship in China. For many years he was a voice crying in the wilderness, warning his countrymen against the danger of the conflict he so clearly saw impending.

The fiery American editor was a thorn in the side of the Japanese. They did everything possible to suppress him. He lived under constant threat of assassination. But attempts at intimidation and glittering offers to buy his newspaper were alike futile. It took courage to maintain his position in Shanghai in the face of the coming storm and Powell paid the penalty in his brutal imprisonment after Pearl Harbor.

When he finally was exchanged and returned to the United States on the Gripsholm he was in for a long period of invalidism and his address was listed in Who's Who as Harkness Pavilion, Presbyterian Hospital, New York. While he was able at last to leave the hospital he remained partly crippled and his exhausted heart eventually gave way.

John Powell left a great legacy to his alma mater and to his profession. He is one of that noble company of whose members it may be said, "He being dead yet speaketh."

A FIGHTING EDITOR

Death came unexpectedly last week for a heroic Missourian. Addressing a meeting in Washington of University of Missouri alumni, John B. Powell, fighting editor of the China Weekly Review, collapsed and died just as he finished his speech. It was, we believe, as he would have preferred it, for the university, of which he was an alumnus and a former faculty member, always held a strong place in his affection.

"J. B.," as he was known throughout the Orient, was an editor who never pulled his punches. He was one of the first who saw the menace of Japanese aggression and was outspoken in his condemnation. He was one of the first Americans marked for arrest after Pearl Harbor and the hardships he suffered in a Japanese prison camp necessitated the amputation of both feet. Last summer he had recovered sufficiently to return to the Far East and testify in the Japanese atrocity trials, but undoubtedly his prison treatment hastened his death.

Newspapermen around the world salute his memory as that of a fighting editor who literally gave his life to print the truth as he saw it.

[From the New York Times]

J. B. POWELL

John B. Powell, hobbling painfully about on his crutches, never thought of himself as a hero. But Japanese hatred and stubborn American courage raised him inevitably to heroic stature. He died as he lived, fighting to the end for his convictions.

Powell, a small-town Missouri editor, went to China in 1917 to run a newspaper there. For a score of years he did run it against hell and high water. Soon convinced that Japan intended to swallow China, he made it his mission to warn the world. Threats, bribe offers, and bombing never swerved him. From 1931 on he was high on the Japanese black list. After Pearl Harbor they had their revenge. Flung into Shanghai's notorious Bridgehouse Prison, his captors froze him, starved and kept him sitting cross-legged in Japanese fashion until beri-beri gangrene began eating away his feet. When he was freed and brought home his feet were gone, but his heart was high.

Three years of operations to restore the use of his legs did not daunt him. From an invalid's cot he threw himself into the fight for a free China, free of the Communist threat as it was finally freed of the Japanese menace. It was with a plea for our strong and unrelaxing vigilance in the Far East still on his lips that his tired heart failed him at last. No civilian in our history ever fought more stanchly for his country or against greater odds. This Nation can best honor his memory by holding as steadfastly to its high principles as he did.

[From the China Daily News, Shanghai, March 3, 1947]

J. B. POWELL

So J. B. Powell is dead. There is not the slightest doubt that his demise at the early age of 59 was largely brought about by suffering he was subjected to by the notorious Japanese gendarmerie in the Bridgehouse immediately at the outbreak of the Pacific War. He has been an outspoken critic of Japan's aggressions in China—but J. B. managed to hit home against the Japanese with such frequence and telling effect that he was regarded by the Japanese as their number one enemy amongst the foreign journalists. It's a matter of little concern now whether it's always possible to agree with everything which the able journalist wrote, but opportunity must be availed to emphasize how true a friend he was of China and how fearlessly he espoused her cause. It may be truly said Powell has given his life for his friends—the Chinese. They and all his colleagues no matter their nationality will regret his passing, though there is consolation in the fact that Powell by residence and work in this country made it richer through sympathy and understanding which he displayed. There can be devout certainty, as the Greatest of All Editors passers upon his work, it will be with well deserved commendation.

[From the China Press, Shanghai, March 2, 1947]

FRIEND OF CHINA PASSES

United States and China—and journalistic circles around the world—are emptier places today for J. B. Powell has written 30. And he wrote it the way all of his many friends and colleagues wherever they may be will be proud of. He wrote it while "still in the saddle" despite the loss of both legs in the course he helped to make for the cause for more than half of mankind.

We humbly bow in the presence of the Great Maker. Little there is to say of J. B. that his great deeds have not already said for him, little truth there is to utter that he has not already made known, to his very last breath. J. B. paid the price for his outspoken, fearless attacks against Japanese aggression. And in paying the price, he was paying it not only for China, not only for the United States, but for all freedom-loving peoples.

In these days of difficulties between the United States and China both peoples should recall the memory of J. B. His was only a journalist's pen. But that pen gave him credentials of an ambassador. China will not forget.

May the earth lie softly above your head, J. B. This is the beginning of a long sleep. But your work will be carried on. For you make truth nobler—a more fearless thing. And as long as truth will survive, so too will your memory.

NAVY REQUISITION FOR TABLEWARE AND SILVERWARE

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief report on a matter which has been mentioned several times on the floor of the Senate recently. I refer to the Navy requisition for tableware and silverware.

Some 3 weeks ago, upon hearing the reports that the Navy had issued a requisition for silver-plated finger bowls and unnecessarily elaborate tableware, I wrote to the Secretary of the Navy and asked if he would withhold placing the order which, according to reports, was contemplated and also to send to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments a copy of the requisition for such tableware and silverware. Mr. Forrestal has been good enough to do this, and the requisition has been received by the committee.

It has been examined by the staff of the committee, and it was found that it not only contained an order for 38,744 silver-plated finger bowls, but also for the same number of silver-plated plates to put under the bowls. The plates, strangely enough, cost a little more than the bowls and come to $48,222.50. The total cost of the bowls and the plates amounts to $97,252.50.

One thing which stands out in the requisition is that each rank, from captain on up, is entitled to its own distinguishing mark on its silverware. Thus, an admiral has one mark on his silverware, a vice admiral has another mark on his silverware, a rear admiral, another; and so on. Silverware for the ward rooms, where the general run of the officers eat, has a separate mark, as does the ware for warrant officers.

This means that each order for forks, for example, must be broken into as many as seven orders for forks, bearing seven different kinds of marks. No one knows how much these little perquisites of rank are costing the taxpayer.

The Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Forrestal, has taken a very fine and commendable stand in this matter, and I should like to read the letter which I have received from him, under date of March 6:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, March 6, 1947.

Hon. GEORGE D. AIKEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR AIKEN: In further reply to your letters of February 20 and March 4, 1947, I am transmitting herewith a copy of the request for tenders of bids for tableware which you requested.

I am very glad that you brought this matter up because it involves a problem which the Navy Department has had under consideration for some time; to wit: the declaration as surplus of articles for which the Department may have a need in the future. After VJ-day the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion requested the Services to declare surplus all material for which there was a civilian use and which was excess to their reasonable short term future needs. Reasonable short term future needs varied depending upon the type of article involved. In the case of tableware it was defined as a 12-month period beyond the procurement lead period. At the time this action was taken it was known that similar articles to those declared surplus would have to be purchased in the future. However it was felt that the assistance being given to civilian reconversion justified the action. This policy was continued for several months until it was felt that the most urgent civilian needs had been satisfied. It is not the policy of the Navy at the present time.

Because of this policy a large quantity of tableware has been declared surplus and disposed of by the War Assets Administration. There is, therefore, not now available in stock a supply of tableware to fill present needs. During the war, to expedite procurement and conserve critical materials, the Navy procured an inferior grade of tableware which was uneconomical to maintain. With the passage of time, a large portion of this wartime tableware has suffered from corrosion to the extent that its use would be dangerous to health.

The replenishment of tableware is necessary at the present time and to take care of these needs the Bureau of Ships forwarded a letter to the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts requesting that bids be obtained for certain types of prewar tableware on the ships' allowance lists. This was the basis for the request for tender of bids, but due to the prices submitted none of the items have been purchased.

I understand none of them will be purchased.

Furthermore, the Bureau of Ships has been directed to modify its specifications for tableware so that a different and simpler type can be obtained.

I am completely in accord with the thoughts expressed in your letter as to the distinction between necessities and niceties of living and, while the allowance lists have been in existence for more than 20 years, I feel that this is an appropriate time for a review of these lists and a deletion therefrom of the niceties. The Bureau of Ships has been directed to do this.

I want to thank you for calling this matter to my attention, and if there is any further information you desire, please let me know.

Sincerely,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is hopeful that by calling attention to these letters before the Senate and directly to the departments, substantial savings may be made, and, more important, that a genuine spirit of economy and conservative buying may be engendered in Federal personnel.

Mr. President, I believe by cooperation between the legislative and the executive branches of Government and by saving a million dollars here and a million dollars there, that after a time it will be found that a very large amount indeed can be saved.

EFFECT OF REMOVAL OF PRICE CONTROLS

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, what capitalism and democracy can least afford now is the collapse—even a partial collapse—of this single remaining stronghold of free enterprise. If a crisis develops in the next few months on the domestic scene, the reason will be failure to keep prices within reach of mass buying through a failure to restrain the impulse to pile up profits in an inflating economy with prices uncontrolled. So far in 1947, I think we can all agree that labor has exercised restraint in trying to force higher wages—this despite prices steadily mounting from already inflated levels and profits at unprecedented heights.

I should like to call attention to some promises which were made to the Seventy-ninth Congress and to the people of the United States in full-page newspaper advertisements in July of last year when we were considering the continuation of price controls.

This is what the National Association of Manufacturers told the people of the country on July 3, in an advertisement entitled "The Future with Confidence," published in the Washington Post:

THE FUTURE WITH CONFIDENCE

The members of the National Association of Manufacturers have no intention of rocking the inflation boat—now or at any other time.

If OPA is permanently discontinued, the production of goods will mount rapidly and, through free competition, prices will quickly adjust themselves to levels that consumers are wiling to pay.

The great majority of American manufacturers are determined to produce as much as they can, as fast as they can, to sell at the lowest possible prices.

American manufacturers are also determined that such price increases as may be necessary will be only those fully justified by increases in wage and other production costs.

Then, Mr. President, the advertisement further states:

Then as production gets rolling again, supply will catch up with demand, prices will be fair and reasonable to all, quality will be improved, black markets will disappear, and America will enter the period of prosperity that everyone has been hoping for.

That advertisement is signed "National Association of Manufacturers." Under the signature appears the following: "For a Better Tomorrow for Everybody."

I now refer, Mr. President, to what the American Meat Institute told the people of the United States on July 5, in a rather prophetic article, at least so far as the title is concerned, because it is entitled "What Price Meat?" This is what the Meat Institute had to say on July 5, when we were considering the question of continuing price control:

WHAT PRICE MEAT?

Painful experience has proved that under OPA regulations:

A. Livestock does not come to market in sufficient quantities.

B. A large proportion of the meat animals which do reach the market are gobbled up by buyers who divert meats from the average consumer to dishonest channels with which the meat industry cannot and will not compete.

It's the consumer who gets hurt.

In making that statement they certainly knew what they were talking about.

I read further:

During the past week of open competition—the first since 1942—there was improvement in marketings of livestock. Such increases in the prices of livestock as have occurred have gone back to the livestock grower as an incentive to production.

Many meat packing plants on which consumers have relied have been completely or partly shut down. It takes a little time for them to start up operations and get their distribution systems working again.

Your meat dealer soon will be able to serve you at honest prices.

American Meat Institute, headquarters, Chicago; members throughout the United States.

Now I should like to call to the attention of the Senate the schedule of prices issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics on March 6, 1947. It is entitled "Agricultural Prices Rise Sharply"; and I ask unanimous consent that the release be printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHOLESALE PRICES FOR WEEK ENDED MARCH 1, 1947 [1]

AGRICULTURAL PRICES RISE SHARPLY

Substantial increases for agricultural commodities and continued advances for industrial goods raised average primary market prices 1.5 percent during the week ended March 1, 1947, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor. The Bureau's index of commodity prices in primary markets reached 146.4 percent of the 1926 average, the highest level since late 1920 but still 12 percent below the May 1920 all-time peak. The index was 4.3 percent above a month earlier and 36.1 percent above a year ago.

Farm products and foods: Market prices of farm products rose 2.6 percent during the week, reaching a level more than 2 percent higher than their previous peak in late November. Markets generally were influenced by bad weather which restricted shipments and by continued heavy demand. Demand for grains was stimulated by the Government's flour-purchase program and expectations of increased export needs. Most quotations advanced as wheat reached the highest levels since the last war and rye, an all-time high. Livestock quotations advanced generaly with hogs at a new peak. Fruits and vegetables averaged slightly higher and prices of eggs were up. There was a fractional advance for raw cotton and prices increased for hay, flaxseed, and peanuts. As a group, farm products were 34.7 percent above the corresponding week of 1946.

Food prices also rose, influenced by the general market conditions, with the group index up 3.1 percent during the week to a level of 55.2 percent above a year earlier. Meat prices rose sharply with pork prices up more than 10 percent, largely reflecting decreased hog shipments. Increases for other meats were due to active demand. Butter prices advanced and there was a fractional increase for cereal products. Scarcity caused higher prices for a number of other foods, including vegetable oils, lard, oleo oil, edible tallow, black pepper, and cocoa beans.

Other commodities: Average prices of all commodities other than farm products and foods advanced 0.3 percent during the week to a level 26.8 percent above a year earlier. Higher costs caused increases for wool fabrics, and cotton goods rose under strong demand. Prices of jute increased following reduction in India's export quota and burlap prices were up. Quotations for calfskins rose sharply as a result of a shortage due to light slaughterings. Prices for other hides and skins continued to decline. Lead prices increased 1 cent a pound, reflecting higher prices in world markets, and bar-silver prices were higher with increased demand. Higher raw-material costs caused increases for silver nitrate, bismuth subnitrate, logwood extract, and iron oxide. Prices of fats and oils and cattle feed advanced. Resistance to previous high prices together with availability of a synthetic substitute, resulted in lower prices for shellac. Turpentine prices dropped sharply. There were price increases for prepared roofing and millwork, still in short supply.

Mr. McMAHON. I should also like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in last week's issue of United States News magazine there appears an article entitled New Rise In Commodity Prices. Higher Costs For Food and Materials Despite Buyer Resistance. Wholesale price rises since the end of controls are listed in a box, and I shall cite a few of them:

Wheat, on October 14, was $2.12. It is now $2.35.

Steers, $19.63 a hundred pounds; now $25.25.

Copper, 14.2; now 19.9.

Tin, 52 cents; now 70 cents.

I am informed that those prices are not yet reflected in full measure in retail costs. For the period between 1939 and 1946, I believe the figures show a rise in commodity prices, during those 7 years, of approximately 33 percent. In the last 7 months—not 7 years—that price rise has been duplicated. I think the Ford Motor Co. and the International Harvester Co. are entitled to great credit for the steps they recently have taken voluntarily to cut the prices of their products.

A few days ago the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the distinguished former chairman of the Finance Committee of this body, stated that in his opinion corporate earnings were rising to a dangerous point. I think those who want to be fair-minded, who believe truly in the profit system and the system of free enterprise, cannot but take alarm when they look at the earning reports which are now coming forth from the great corporations. I beg and plead with some of the managers of vast corporate enterprises not to pull down the pillars of the temple in which we reside. I ask them to exercise restraint. I ask them to stop before it is too late and before they start another inevitable demand for further wage increases that can do nothing except plunge into decay and ruin the free-enterprise system as we know it, which, with the exception of that of Canada, is the last on the face of the earth.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator has told us that corporate profits have risen to a dangerous level; he has told us about prices rising to unprecedented heights. No doubt the Senator has intimated that we now have in our economy the greatest concentration of monopolistic power we have ever had in our history. Yet is it not a fact that while all those things are true, we are confronted today with the most determined drive we have ever faced to weaken the power of labor in America?

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator.

AID FOR THE PHYSICALLY AND MENTALLY HANDICAPPED

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, having long been deeply concerned with the welfare of our physically and mentally handicapped citizens, including disabled veterans, I am much interested in the latest effort to promote full employment of the handicapped which has just been launched by Secretary of Labor Lewis B. Schwellenbach.

Secretary Schwellenbach has written to all governors of States, calling attention to the employment needs of our millions of disabled, and suggesting a practical method of States' participation in developing an employment program for them.

To meet modern-day requirements, Secretary Schwellenbach suggests that each State establish, as an integral part of its employment system, an agency to be known as Services for Handicapped, and has supplied an outline detailing ways and means that such an agency should be operated.

This is a very fine conception and I congratulate the Secretary upon his appropriate suggestion to the governors, and hope that they will meet the challenge by establishing Services for Handicapped in every State.

My own interest in this field developed largely through my sponsorship, while a Member of the House, of a bill to establish a Federal Commission for the Physically Handicapped, in collaboration with the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, whose president, Mr. Paul A. Strachan, has been indefatigable in efforts to improve the condition of all handicapped people, and who was the author of National Employ-the-Handicapped Week, enacted by the Seventy-ninth Congress, and which was sponsored in the House by former Representative Jerry Voorhis, and in the Senate by our colleague the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE].

I may say that this past year, spearheaded by a national campaign in which all Federal and State agencies at interest participated, and including national organizations of industry, business, labor, veterans, farm, women, religious, civic, educational, scientific and professional, and other groups, National Employ-the-Handicapped Week was the means of placing in gainful employment, through the 1,800 local offices of the United States Employment Service, 29,422 handicapped people, of whom 19,200 were disabled veterans. That is a splendid result, and the Congress is to be congratulated upon its support for this most worthy program which, by law, will be continued every year hereafter.

I am sure the progressive step advocated by the Secretary of Labor in suggesting that services for handicapped be a regular part of the machinery of the State employment system will produce good results, and I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary's letter to governors, as well as the Outline of a Model Plan for Employment of Physically and Mentally Handicapped, be included in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and outline were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Washington, February 26, 1947.

DEAR GOVERNOR: During the past 2 years, it has been my pleasure to cooperate with your State in promoting the observance of National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week. I have been gratified, as I am sure you have been, with the results obtained from that effort. Largely through the State and Federal cooperative program, startling results have been obtained in increasing the number of job placements for handicapped people. Last October, the month in which this effort was made, 29,400 placements of handicapped were made through the public employment offices, of whom 19,200 were disabled veterans. This represented an increase of 38 percent over the previous month.

The statistics for the months following October show a decided drop in the total number of handicapped people placed and, to me, indicate a problem which we must attack jointly if anything like adequate service to the handicapped is to be achieved. Clearly we need a program which will give us results on a year-round basis to supplement the special 1-week effort carried on by the States and the Federal Government during the past 2 years. We must see that constant improvement is made in the service provided by the agencies which have been given the responsibility for assisting the handicapped in becoming gainfully employed.

The return of the Employment Service to the States furnishes an opportunity to continue the development of improved services for workers and employers of the Nation. These improvements can be worked out most effectively, in my judgment, in a spirit of mutual cooperation and good will between the Federal and State Governments.

I am presenting for your consideration in this letter and the attached document the serious employment problem of our handicapped citizens, a brief description of the recommended program for placement of the handicapped by local employment offices, and a suggested State and community program for coordinating the efforts of individuals and organizations interested in the employment problems of the handicapped. A copy of the statement also is being forwarded by the Director of the United States Employment Service to the head of the State agency of which the Employment Service is a part.

It is estimated conservatively that of the approximate 28,000,000 of our citizens who are physically handicapped, from five to seven million of these are employable. Public concern with the problems of the handicapped has been intensified by the return of disabled veterans to civilian life. In addition, most communities face the problem of providing assistance to individuals who have become disabled through industrial accidents or other causes. Productive and useful work is not only a means of securing a livelihood, it is also a means of inculcating self-reliance and maintaining self-respect, the very pillars of our Nation's independence and development.

The trend of our effort, then, is to provide ways and means so that our handicapped citizens may become economic assets instead of liabilities. You, as chief executive of a great State, certainly understand the relation between the tax dollar and the handicapped. If we can find ways and means to rehabilitate and put them to work we shall not only be performing a great humanitarian task but we shall be saving—even gaining—money, because restoration of many of these individuals to productive, taxable status will, naturally, not only aid them but their communities, States, and the Nation itself.

The United States Department of Labor and the United States Employment Service have emphasized the importance of placing the handicapped in suitable and productive employment. More than 1,000,000 handicapped persons have been placed by the local employment offices in the past 6 years through selective placement procedures. We have tried many different procedures and have retained those we have found worth while. The program includes the promotion of employment opportunities for the handicapped and assistance to employers in establishing plans for the utilization of handicapped workers. The program described in the attached document has been based upon this experience.

In order to encourage the provision of the kind of service needed by the handicapped, I urge that you give to each of the State agencies which have a part in providing the services your strongest support for their programs, to achieve on a year-round basis the high degree of public interest, cooperation, and coordination exhibited during National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week. I urge, also, that you take whatever steps are appropriate to establish the permanent services for handicapped described in attached plan.

I would appreciate it if you would review the suggested plan and discuss it with the appropriate State officials. I would also appreciate it if you would let me have the benefit of any comments you may wish to make. I am confident that through such cooperative efforts important strides can be made in meeting this challenging problem.

Yours very truly,

LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH,
Secretary of Labor.

OUTLINE OF SUGGESTED PLAN OF EMPLOYMENT FOR PHYSICALLY AND MENTALLY HANDICAPPED PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT SERVICES

I. PROBLEMS OF THE HANDICAPPED

Millions of citizens with some physical or mental impairment or deficiency are capable of doing good work and earning their way, if they are provided with suitable employment. Handicapped individuals, generally, may be designated as falling into one or the other of the following classifications:

1. Hospitalized, or institutionalized, or home-bound.

2. Those needing sheltered work conditions; being capable only of substandard performance, short-time jobs, and similar limited employment.

3. Those competitively employable.

It is sound public policy to provide ways and means by which handicapped persons can be matched with suitable and productive jobs, in which they can utilize their skills effectively.

There is a great and understandable humanitarian interest in the individual problems of the handicapped worker, whether the handicap arises from military or civilian life, as evidenced by the widespread public interest in the October 1946 observance of National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week in some 4,000 cities across the country. Productive and useful work is not only a means of securing a livelihood—it is also the means of assuring the self-respect and self-reliance which are at the root of American character. We must do everything within our power to encourage such attributes of independence.

In addition, there is a direct economic advantage to be gained by the Nation through the provision of assistance which will enable our handicapped citizens to assume their proper places as productive workers in our economy and thus turn themselves into assets rather than liabilities. Effective training and placement of the handicapped results in reduction of the tax burden which would otherwise be imposed for direct relief, and in the increase of our productive facilities. The handicapped portion of our labor force is a material resource which should not be left idle or ignored.

II. SERVICES FOR HANDICAPPED (STATE AGENCY)

The primary means for accomplishing the objectives of this program are the facilities of the Federal-State system of public employment services.

Each State should establish a service for handicapped in the State employment service agency, to be headed by a chief, who would be provided with sufficient staff and facilities to enable him to discharge his responsibilities in an adequate and efficient manner.

Local offices selective placement program

Selective placement is the term which the employment Service applies to its over-all program of service to the handicapped. All local office interviewers are trained to recognize those handicapped individuals who need special assistance in selecting an occupation or in obtaining a suitable job. Individuals requiring these specialized services are served by staff, designated as selective placement counselors.

Recommendations of the United States Employment Service on staffing services to handicapped in the local offices are as follows:

"Employment counseling and selective placement of the handicapped involve the use of special techniques in assisting applicants who present problems in occupational adjustment. To assure effective performance, personnel designated and especially trained to perform the functions are required in all offices, although in small offices it will constitute only a part-time activity. When the size of staff and volume of activity requires more than one full-time counselor, personnel should be designated to specialize in service to the handicapped.

"Counseling staff shall be assigned to specialize in service to handicapped applicants in accordance with the pattern described below.

"Variations in load will require more staff time in some offices than that indicated in the table.

"In all cases, performance of the selective placement functions shall have priority over all other duties assigned to the individual."

The experience of the United States Employment Service has shown that in offices of 9 or less staff members, 1 individual must be given responsibility for this function and must be given sufficient time to handle the work load; in offices from 10 to 29, 1 staff member assigned and trained with expectancy that at least half his time would be required; in offices from 30 to 49, 1 staff member on full time, and in some cases that staff member should be assisted by a second individual on part time; in offices from 50 to 75, 1 person, full time, and a second staff member designated to provide part-time assistance; in offices from 79 to 99, 2 full-time staff members to be designated, and in some cases additional, part-time assistance from other staff members; in offices with staff of 130 to 149, 4 full-time selective-placement counselors should be assigned.

Recommended functions to be performed by the selective-placement counselor for the handicapped are as follows:

a. Assisting handicapped applicants to develop suitable occupational plan.

b. Assisting them to put the plan into effect, which may involve:

A. Directing them to other agencies for services, to supplement those provided by USES; for example, vocational training or rehabilitation, under the provisions of Public Laws 16 and 113.

B. Participating in placement activities when necessary to supplement the placement activities of regular interviewers.

C. Developing job opportunities for specific applicants.

D. Performing activities designed to promote opportunities for the handicapped. These include:

1. Working with the local office employer-relations representatives in order that they will be equipped to place proper emphasis on employment of the handicapped during their visits to employers and will recognize opportunities for using the technical assistance of the Selective Placement Counselor.

2. Obtaining employer acceptance of the selective placement approach and the local office selective placement program, through visits to employers or employer institutes.

3. Providing assistance to employers in establishing in-plant programs for employment of the handicapped, including instructing their personnel departments and foremen in the selective placement approach and techniques.

4. Working with labor organizations, veterans' organizations, civic organizations, and other agencies, to promote their understanding of the selective-placement program.

5. Training other local office staff, as required in all phases of service to the handicapped, and providing technical assistance to them.

6. Evaluating local office service to the handicapped and recommending to the next level of supervision necessary changes in procedures and methods. (In offices in which there is more than one selective-placement counselor, this function shall be performed by the supervisor).

III. QUALIFICATIONS OF PROFESSIONAL PERSONNEL

Effective service to the handicapped rests upon the professional competence of the selective-placement counselors. It is clear that they must possess better than average ability and experience, because they are charged with the duty of placing persons who present special problems. Personnel assigned to serve the handicapped should, therefore, be selected from the most able and experienced placement officers. In addition to the ability and knowledge required for the analysis of jobs and job applicants, such persons should be mature, well adjusted, and have a real interest in the problems of the handicapped. It is well to note that in many instances qualified placement officers, who are themselves handicapped, have made the best showing as selective-placement counselors.

Salary scales for handicapped placement specialists should be commensurate with the importance and value of their position. Today, because of the too-low salary levels in this vital service, Federal and State employment services are being rapidly denuded of many of their best men and women, and there should be an immediate upward revision of their compensation so as to provide proper pay and career opportunities for them.

Training

The United States Employment Service, in addition to developing procedures, tools, and facilities, has devised comprehensive training programs. All States inducting new personnel for this function should utilize material and services and call upon the United States Employment Service for any technical assistance they may need. Adequate training of personnel is basic to the conduct of an effective program.

For interviewers experienced in regular placement, experience has shown that at least a formal training period, approximating 1 week, is necessary. Additional time should be added, as supervisory responsibilities are increased.

Frequent refresher courses and conferences should be carried on. It is suggested that such courses and conferences be spaced at intervals of not less than 4 months apart, so that the latest developments in this field may be available to all, and thus insure continual improvement in techniques.

IV. BUDGET

Intelligent recognition and understanding of the relationship of the handicapped problem to sound public policy dictates that agencies serving their interest have separate additional budgetary allowances. Handicap placement, for example, is more expensive than placement of nonhandicapped, primarily because it takes more time to interview the applicant, and more time to find suitable jobs. Further, there should not be undue stress, on the part of local managers, to the end that the number of placements be arbitrarily maintained at high number, without regard to suitability of job for the applicant, or vice versa. Placements made under forced pressure and without proper consideration of all factors can only result in deterioration of the handicapped program, and lessened effectiveness of service to both employers and the handicapped.

Special budgetary allowances should cover the following:

1. Books, periodicals, and other material on the handicapped.
2. Conferences of agencies interested in the handicapped.
3. Conferences for development of program.
4. Cost of training courses for personnel.
5. Promotional literature.
6. Exhibits for public places, required for promotion.
7. Motion pictures for promotion purposes.
8. Testing programs for specific job.
9. Research in the special problems of the several types of disabilities and possible solutions.
10. Studies of occupations and occupational research leading to determination of physical demands of each occupation.
11. Continual surveys of handicapped, as to their working capacities, including volume and quality of work performed.
12. Absenteeism, attitude toward the job, etc.
13. Special studies of problems in sparsely settled rural areas.

V. COMMUNITY PROGRAMS

There should be close cooperation between services for handicapped, and local organizations, including chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations, labor unions, veterans' organizations, civic groups such as Rotary, Kiwanis, Civitan, Lions, etc., women's clubs, fraternal orders, professional groups such as medical societies, engineering and research organizations, etc., together with the various organizations especially serving the handicapped.

In rural areas there should be close cooperation with the Extension Service of the Department of Agriculture; local organizations of the American Farm Bureau Federation, National Grange, and National Farmers Union. In rural areas, handicapped have been neglected to a considerable degree, and strong efforts should be made to remedy this situation.

In the larger cities where such services are available, there should be close cooperation with organizations conducting sheltered workshops, or, other industries established primarily for handicapped workers.

VI. NATIONAL EMPLOY THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED WEEK

Enactment of Public Resolution 176 by the Seventy-ninth Congress establishes the first week in October in each year as National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week. Presidential and gubernatorial proclamations have, for the past 2 years, in connection with this observance, called to public attention the need for employment of the physically handicapped. The results have been excellent and plans are being made for continuance of this laudable activity, which has been responsible for greatly increasing the number of placements of handicapped individuals.

All States should continue to participate wholeheartedly in this program.

VII. EMPLOYERS' INSTITUTES

Services for handicapped could, and should, promote employers' institutes, where there may be full and free discussion of all phases of employment of handicapped. Such institutes might be made annual or semiannual affairs so that the yearly program would contemplate operating such conferences in several cities in each State, without conflict as to dates.

VIII. EXPOSITIONS

An effective way to promote public and employer interest in the handicapped would be, to stage expositions, in which the products of their work would be shown, as well as actual demonstrations showing the handicapped at work.

Such expositions could be promoted by inviting all local businesses and interested public and private agencies to participate. One such exposition was held in Detroit, Mich., in October 1946. While it was a modest beginning, the idea was sound, and the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, which initiated the effort, enlisted support of business, labor, professional, welfare, and other organizations, and with the cooperation of the United States Employment Service, Veterans' Administration, State rehabilitation service, and other public and private agencies, succeeded in a large measure in making the community conscious of the abilities of handicapped, as workers. The AFPH, with these other organizations, is planning to make this an annual exposition. The plan is commended to all States.

SUMMARY

The suggestions submitted herein, it is believed, are necessary and practicable. This memorandum contains sufficient reference to administrative methods and procedures to demonstrate the feasibility of the suggested plan, but it is not intended to be an exhaustive study.

Upon application, the details of this outline will be made available.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 1030) to continue in effect certain war excise tax rates, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOWLAND in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment, on page 1, in lines 6, 7, and 8.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today has been somewhat of a field day, and perhaps we have neglected the pending measure. If possible, I should like to have a quorum present and a vote taken on the first committee amendment to House Joint Resolution 27.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin suggest the absence of a quorum?

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] are absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 6, after the words "ratified by", it is proposed to strike out "the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States" and insert "conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution", so as to read:

That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution.

Mr. WILEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TAFT. Is my understanding correct that a vote "yea" is a vote in favor of the convention method of ratification, and a vote "nay" is a vote in favor of ratification by the legislatures of the several States?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is correct. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] are necessarily absent. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] is necessarily absent on State business. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN] is absent by leave of the Senate, and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is necessarily absent. If present and voting he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] is absent because of illness. He is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is absent because of the death of his wife. If he were present he would vote "nay."

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED].

I announce further that if present and voting the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 63, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence on Wednesday, on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the leave is granted.

Mr. WILEY obtained the floor.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Does the Senator from Wisconsin intend to ask for the adoption of the second committee amendment at this time?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I have an amendment at the desk which I wish to offer as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the second amendment of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, after line 9, it is proposed to strike out "Any person who has served as President of the United States during all, or portions, of any two terms, shall thereafter be ineligible to hold the office of President; but this article shall not prevent any person who may hold the office of President during the term within which this article is ratified from holding such office for the remainder of such term" and to insert "A person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, on 365 calendar days or more in each of two terms shall not be eligible to hold the office of President, or to act as President, for any part of another term; but this article shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President or acting as President during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington offer his amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I offer my amendment as a substitute, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the amendment is offered formally, and read at the desk, I assume there will be no objection to taking the same action with reference to the amendment in section 2 as the Senate has just taken as to section 1, that is, to restore the provision calling for ratification by the legislatures rather than by the convention method. I make that suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin, in charge of the joint resolution.

Mr. WILEY. If there is no objection, Mr. President, I ask that, in accordance with the vote just had in relation to the amendment in section 1, similar action be taken with regard to the amendment in section 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the committee amendment on page 2, lines 15 and 16 is rejected.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I now offer my amendment as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted on page 2, beginning in line 4, and extending down to and including line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, to my mind, the suggested amendment is in the nature of a perfecting amendment. There was much discussion in committee, legal and otherwise, regarding not only the House bill but the committee amendment which is now before the Senate. Many questions were raised; for example, as to whether a man who was acting as President was actually a President; and as to the period during which a man could hold office as acting President, and if he was elevated to the office of President through circumstances beyond his control, to what period he should be limited.

The committee amendment is in very complicated legal language. I doubt if many State legislators could really understand its wording, but in effect it was an honest attempt to provide a restriction, so that if, through an unfortunate circumstance, such as the death of the President, or otherwise, the Vice President should assume the office of President, or act as President for any one year, meaning one calendar year of 365 days, thereafter he would be eligible to run for the Presidency only once.

We might as well get down to brass tacks: This joint resolution was submitted by those who are anxious to have it passed, as I understand their position, solely because of their objection to a man who had deliberately sought and obtained the office of President, using the office during the course of two terms in an effort to perpetuate himself in the office.

A Vice President, or a Secretary of State, and so on, all down the line of succession, through circumstances beyond his control, and with no deliberation on his part, might, because of some unfortunate circumstances, be required to assume the Presidential office. If he assumed the office and occupied it for 1 year, not as the result of a deliberate act upon his part, and then held the office for another term, he would be barred from running for the office again. What is really intended to be reached by those who desire the passage of the measure would be accomplished by the language of my amendment, which merely says in simple language, "No person shall be elected to the office of President more than twice." It seems to me it is a perfect amendment which could be easily understood by everyone, and which would not involve complicated legal questions such as, "When is a man Acting President? When does he assume the office?"

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I to understand from the Senator's remarks that he construes this amendment simply to mean, for example, that if a Vice President went into the Presidency and served, let us say, 30 days, and the term of the incumbent expired, then he would only be eligible for another 4 years?

Mr. MAGNUSON. If he served longer than a year—that is, more than a calendar year of 365 days.

Mr. LUCAS. If he served more than a year, then he would only be eligible for 4 more years; in other words, 5 years would be the limitation placed upon him.

Mr. MAGNUSON. In effect, under the committee amendment, it is possible that a man could be President for only 5 years. The 1 year he served prior to his first 4-year term would bar him from running for another 4 years, although his first service might have been brought about by no deliberation on his part, but because of an emergency or an unfortunate circumstance beyond his control.

What is really being sought by those who oppose more than two terms, as I garner it, as the result of conversations, is to prevent a man's deliberately using the office of President in order to perpetuate himself in office; that is, for more than two terms. I think the language of the committee amendment is bad; it is difficult to understand. It seems to me that my amendment makes it simple and strikes at the heart of what is desired to be corrected.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I very much favor the Senator's amendment, and I think it says what we want to say, if we are going to say anything about it.

I want to call attention to another thing. A man might serve as Vice President and be required to fill the vacancy. That is understood. He would feel inclined, he might even feel in duty bound, to carry out the policies of the man he succeeded, under those circumstances. Every man is entitled to have an endorsement term of his own policy. Having been elected, and having served for a term, he is entitled to an endorsement term. That is democracy.

The committee amendment would preclude such a man having the opportunity to submit his candidacy for an endorsement term, if he served out an unexpired term.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Because he did his duty, he would be penalized. He would be barred from running for the office of President more than once.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the joint resolution were adopted in the form proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Washington, it would, in my opinion, be far more persuasive with the American people and would be more persuasive with the State legislators than the joint resolution in its present form.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I like the amendment of the Senator from Washington much better than the committee amendment. I am not a member of the committee. There may be some reason why the amendment of the Senator from Washington is not preferable to the committee amendment. But until some Senator gives us a better reason than has heretofore been given I shall continue in the belief that the amendment of the Senator from Washington is preferable and does what we want to do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should be glad if the Senators on the other side of the Chamber would raise their voices so that we on this side could hear the discussion that is going on.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I stated that I am not a member of the committee; that there may be good reasons why the committee amendment is preferable to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, but that, so far as I have been able to think my way through, I am convinced that the amendment of the Senator from Washington is preferable to the committee amendment. What we are trying to do is to stop any man from being elected President more than twice. I am for that. I think it is a fine thing to put in the Constitution. But under the committee amendment a man could be prohibited from being elected President more than once, provided that he had served more than 1 year prior to the time he was elected President. Therefore it is conceivable that a man would be limited, under the committee amendment, to serving in the Presidency only 5 years. I think that provision is a little stringent. I think if we limit the Presidency to two elected terms in that office we will do what I believe a great many Americans want done. If we were to strain it still further I am afraid we would bring about opposition in some of the legislatures to the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment. Whereas if the constitutional amendment provided for two elected terms, and that is all that was put before the legislature, in my judgment it would secure more votes and have a better chance of adoption. I should like to see the Presidency limited to two terms.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I think possibly the Senator from Maryland has in mind the language as it came from the House when he speaks of the limitation that would be made. The House language is as follows:

> Any person who has served as President of the United States during all, or portions, of any two terms, shall thereafter be ineligible to hold the office of President.

Under the committee amendment he could hold the office for two terms and almost 1 year, but if he had been in office more than 1 year before the next term of office, he would be limited to election to the additional term only.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is correct. But under the committee amendment, it is possible that if a man was elevated to the Presidency from the Vice Presidency, and served as President 1 year, through a calendar year, then he would be forever barred from running for the Presidency more than once thereafter. He would be limited to only one term thereafter.

Mr. WILEY. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I think he and I agree on what the language means. To illustrate, let us assume that the Vice President becomes President through death of the President or in any other way, and serves only 300 days. Then he is elected President. He could then be elected for a second term, serving two terms and a little less than a year of the term of his predecessor. But if he served 366 days as President by reason of the death or otherwise of his predecessor, and then was elected President, he would be forbidden from running for President again after he had served the one term to which he was elected. Considering that wars and depressions and all kinds of unforeseen things quite often come to pass during a Presidential term, it seems to me that the people ought to have the right to elect a man to two full terms in the Presidency if they want to do so, and that we ought not to deny them the right to elect a President for two full terms, but we ought to provide that a man cannot be elected President for more than two terms.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator's amendment provides that "No person shall be elected to the office of President more than twice." But he could have served a portion of a term by reason of death or resignation or disability of the previous incumbent.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. It seems to me that opposition to such a provision is not tenable.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the amendment is a good one.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It seems to me the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, if adopted, would create a most peculiar situation under the American system of elections. Under the Senator's amendment, an individual who becomes President by accident, an act of divine providence, or otherwise, and who was not originally elected to the position, is the only person who can hold protracted office in the Presidency. One who was elected to the Presidency by the will of the people, under the Senator's amendment, can serve only two terms, and accident, chance, or act of divine providence will be the only reason whereby an individual can hold office for a substantial period beyond the two terms.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is correct, but of course we cannot foresee such contingencies or legislate against them. But by the same token, and in reverse, an individual could serve in the Presidency 366 days and then he would be forever barred, under the committee amendment from running for the Presidency more than once thereafter.

The committee discussed the matter at great length. There can be Acting Presidents of the United States. That is legal. In other words, what is sought to be done by this limitation of the Presidential tenure is to abolish what some say might become the evil of a man deliberately seeking the office and then using the power of office to perpetuate himself.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That may be the purpose of the sponsor of the amendment, the Senator from Washington, but in the amendment he is creating a most unusual situation. The only person who can possibly serve for more than two terms, under the Senator's amendment, is someone who, let us say, as I stated a moment ago, by divine providence or some other intervention accidentally comes into the Presidency, who has never been voted upon by the people for that office.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Instead of giving the preference and the privilege to a man or a woman who has been affirmatively voted into the Presidential office by the people, the advantage is given to someone who has never been voted into the particular office by the people.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The disadvantage is given to the same man under the committee amendment. I do not think we should deal with contingencies whereby a man because of circumstances beyond his control is elevated to a high office.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. Does not the committee amendment make a discrimination? Does it not discriminate against the man who, as the Senator from Iowa says, accidentally gets into office and while he is accidentally holding the office does such a good job that he is elected to the office? Would not the theory of the committee proposal bar such a man from being reelected? It seems to me that we should reward rather than punish merit.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That would not be true under the theory of my amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The argument of the Senator from Iowa, if I may have his attention, will not, I think, hold water, because he is perfectly willing for a man to be elected twice and to serve, in addition to his two terms, 300 days.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not quite agree that the Senator is right in assuming what I believe. In fact, I would just as soon limit the term of service of a President to not more than two terms, in any event, leaving out of consideration the 365 days.

Mr. TYDINGS. The trouble with the argument of the Senator from Iowa, as I understand it, is that he has no objection, under the committee amendment, to a man serving two terms plus less than a year. Am I wrong?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That might be said to be stretching a belief a little.

Mr. TYDINGS. Am I wrong?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The Senator is wrong——

Mr. TYDINGS. Therefore what the Senator says about a man getting into office by accident does not apply, because he says that if he gets into office by accident and serves 364 days, he may run for President again. But if he gets into office by accident and serves 366 days, he may not run for office again. So it seems to me the Senator meets himself coming back. He takes a week-end trip of 3 or 4 days and changes the whole Constitution.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. If I correctly understand the difference between the two amendments, under the committee amendment a man might be held to a service of 5 years. The longest he could serve would be 8 years. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, he might serve 8 years, or he might serve as long as 11½ years. My objection to the Senator's argument is that 11½ years is too long. I think the general precedent has been the other way.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Does not the Senator feel that 5 years is too short?

Mr. TAFT. Strange to say, Presidents have died in the first year of their terms. Garfield died in the first year of his term. Arthur served 3 years. William Henry Harrison died in the first year. Tyler served 3 years. McKinley died in the first year of his second term, and Theodore Roosevelt served for 3 years and was elected for a full term, serving a total of 7 years. At that time that was considered to be in conformity with the two-term rule, as then applied. He did not run for reelection.

In the case of Coolidge, Harding died almost within his first year. Coolidge served for 3 years, and for an elective term of 4 years in addition, and then did not run again, apparently feeling that the total of 7 years was in conformity with the two-term rule.

It is not only a question of power. It seems to me that it is a question of whether a man should serve that long as President of the United States. By reason of the Vice Presidential situation, we cannot say "8 years or nothing." I should be perfectly willing to vote for one term of 6 years and say that no one should be President more than 6 years. The provision of the committee amendment that no man shall be President for more than 5 years is perfectly reasonable to me. If the Senator wishes to make it 6 years, I am willing to compromise with him. But I think it is a great mistake to say that a man may serve for 11 years. I think that is too long. I think it would break down his health. I do not believe that any man ought to serve that long, from the standpoint of his welfare or that of the Nation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I think there is a great deal in what he says, that 11½ years in the Presidency is too long. My point is that 5 years in the Presidency may be too short. If this amendment were changed so that a man could serve 7 years in the Presidency, then I think we might prevent him for running for a second elective term. But this amendment takes the other extreme, so to speak. The two extremes are 11 years and 5 years, instead of 8. If we are to allow some Presidents to serve 8 years, then in good faith we ought to permit Vice Presidents who are elected President after they serve a part of the term of their predecessor, due to his death, a longer time than 5 years in which to be President. If it is right to have a limitation of 8 years for a twice-elected President, then why in heaven's name is it not right to give a Vice President the 3 years which he may serve in the term of his predecessor plus one full term, rather than limit him to 5 years?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Under the amendment of the Senator from Washington he could serve for 11 years, and be elected twice.

Mr. MAGNUSON. We are talking about extremes.

Mr. TAFT. The people can end his service at 4 years, if they so desire. It is the extreme in which we are interested, and not the short term.

Mr. MAGNUSON. In any event, the people of the United States should have the right once to vote for a man and say, "We want him for our President." They should also have the right to say, "He has been a good President, and we want to elect him again." Under the committee amendment that would not be possible.

Mr. TAFT. I am willing to vote for one term of 6 years, instead of two terms totaling 8 years.

I should like to read a resolution adopted by the Senate——

Mr. MAGNUSON. Am I to understand that the Senator from Ohio favors one term of 6 years?

Mr. TAFT. I do not care whether it is one term of 6 years or two terms of 4 years.

I should like to read the resolution adopted by the Senate near the end of Coolidge's term, after he had served 3 years of the term of his predecessor and 4 years of an elective term. Apparently the question worrying the Senate was whether Coolidge intended to run for another term, and thereby serve 11 years. The Senate adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the Presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Was that after Coolidge declined to run?

Mr. TAFT. No. That was near the end of Coolidge's term, before he had declined to run. It was in the nature of a warning. The Senate did not think he ought to run. I may say that the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] voted for that resolution, as did the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. TYDINGS. I am still for it.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and several other Senators now Members of this body voted for it.

I think the generally accepted belief has been that if a man has served 3 years of the term of his predecessor and 4 years of an elected term, that conforms to the two-term rule, and he should not be reelected. Whether the 1 year of service mentioned in the committee amendment is perhaps too short, I am not prepared to say. But I think it would be a great mistake to say that after a man had been President for 3 years, he should then be eligible for two more terms, serving a total of 11 years. If that is all that is to be accomplished by the joint resolution I do not believe it is worth while to pass it. Personally I would prefer one 6-year term. But certainly the length of service should not be more than 9 years, in accordance with the committee amendment. I think that is as long as anyone should be permitted to serve.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, we are talking about two extremes. There is probably a happy medium. What impresses me most is that when a man assumes the office of President by reason of the death or disability of his predecessor, the people ought to have the right to endorse him for a second term if he has done a good job. They can do so only by election.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. It is not quite material to this issue; but in view of what the Senator from Ohio said about the resolution which was adopted during the Coolidge administration, I wish to reemphasize the point that it was merely a resolution adopted by the United States Senate.

For some reason at that time it was not felt advisable to introduce a joint resolution providing for a constitutional amendment and submit it to the American people. I do not know what went on in those days, but I imagine it was much the same as what is going on today. Partisan politics played its part in that particular resolution when there was talk about running Coolidge for a third term; and partisan politics is playing its part today on the floor of the United States Senate. Partisan inspiration is responsible for this proposed constitutional amendment. The Senator from Ohio has seen fit to call attention to the fact that the Senate went on record in a resolution which followed the language of the Springer resolution back in the days of Grant. Representative Springer, of Illinois, used the same language which was later used in the Senate during the Coolidge regime. At that time Members of the House did not sponsor a constitutional amendment. They chose to adopt a pious political resolution. I will not say that some Members of Congress do not have convictions upon this question; but I do say that at the bottom of this resolution is partisan politics. The basis of the resolution which was adopted in the Coolidge days, and the one adopted in the days of Grant, was partisan politics.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HILL. On last Friday I spoke at some length on the pending joint resolution, but nothing that I said at that time points up the fallacy of the joint resolution or demonstrates so clearly and unmistakably how unwise the pending measure is, as does the debate which has just taken place on the committee amendment and the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington. The debate shows beyond all peradventure of doubt that this iron-handed and rigid provision should not be put into the Constitution to deny the people their right to determine this question themselves. The question of who should be elected President and how long he should serve should remain where it has been for the past 150 years, that is, in the sound judgment and the wisdom of the people of the United States.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I will yield in a moment. I want to make my position clear. I said at the outset that this was, in my opinion, a perfecting amendment. In the committee the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] and I and several other Senators joined in having the joint resolution amended so as to provide for the convention system, so that the people would have the right to pass on the question. Now that the committee amendment has been rejected, I reserve the right, if the question goes to my State, to decide how I shall vote on it. I am almost constrained, particularly if this language stays in, to vote against the pending joint resolution. My only purpose is to make it simple so that the people of the United States will know what they are voting on when it is presented to the States.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a moment? If he has concluded, I will take the floor in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Washington completed his remarks?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on this question I have had many ideas. First, let me say that on Wednesday, because of long-standing engagements, I shall have to be absent from the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that I may absent myself from the Senate on Wednesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. HATCH. I have previously told the people of my State that they had the right, aside from partisan politics, to decide for themselves by constitutional amendment whether they wanted to tie their hands on the election of a President. If I were present on Wednesday, and if this resolution should come to a vote, I would vote to submit such an amendment. I had made up my mind to do that because I had made previous promises which I wanted to keep. But as I have listened to the debate this afternoon I have almost changed my mind, because, like the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], I see nothing in this resolution but party politics. Yes; I see something more than that. I see the complete failure of the majority party to carry the responsibility which they said they were willing to carry when they went into the campaign last November.

Mr. President, I agree wholeheartedly with everything the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] said when he stated that the majority party had failed in the promises which they had made.

Nothing could be more evident from the debate this afternoon than that the Republican Party, the majority party, is still looking backward. It is still the party of fear. What do they fear? They are afraid, Mr. President, of the voice of a ghost, of the only man who was ever reelected President 3 times. They are afraid of him, and they are now endeavoring to legislate against Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. President, I still intend to vote to submit the proposed constitutional amendment to the people of my State and to the people of the Nation so that they may determine whether they wish to adopt an amendment by which they would limit themselves to choosing a President for two terms, for 8 or 11 years.

What a mighty debate this has been! What a wonderful thought was conveyed to the country when the Senate of the United States argued over the difference between 8, 9, and 11½ years!

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator not feel that the debate with which we have been regaled during the past hour and a half is a pretty conclusive demonstration that the constitutional fathers knew what they were doing and could write an understandable provision into the Constitution?

Mr. HATCH. So persuasive is the Senator from Wyoming that while I still adhere to the promise which I made, I shall go back to New Mexico, before the legislature, or before a convention, and say, "Turn down this amendment; vote it down quickly, because you, the people, have a better idea as to whom you want to elect President than any party politician can have."

So, Mr. President, I shall vote to submit the amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator agree with me, as a result of what he knows has happened in the last 150 years on the question of tenure, that the founding fathers were the only ones who were fair and impartial with reference to this very question?

Mr. HATCH. They knew so much more than we that I am frankly ashamed of our poor, pitiful effort as demonstrated here today, when we argue over the difference between 8 and 11 years.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator knows that the Nation has lived and prospered and been happy for 150 years under the tenure provision in the Constitution of the United States, and now the Senate is about to say that it has more wisdom than had the founders of the Republic, and that it is better prepared to say what the citizen of tomorrow should do than would the citizen himself if a great emergency should confront him 50 years hence.

Mr. HATCH. No; I cannot agree to that.

Mr. LUCAS. That is what we are saying if we pass this joint resolution.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Of course the Senator has no objection to trying to make the people understand what they are doing.

Mr. HATCH. I certainly could vote for the amendment of the Senator from Washington, because, after all, the only basis on which it is submitted is that no man should be elected to the office of President more than twice. There is a great deal of confusion. It is not only a question whether he may be elected twice, but how long he may serve if he succeeds to the office as Vice President—for 365 days or 366 days. There are 366 days in some years.

I am wondering if it is possible that some Senators could be looking at the present situation. The Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] is nodding his head. He is a member of the committee. Are Senators afraid that the present President of the United States will be reelected in 1948 and possibly again 4 years later? Ah, Mr. President, with the great problems of reconstruction, the great problems of world affairs confronting us, with the peace of all the world and the lives and safety of our sons involved, yet we argue over the difference between 5 years and 11 years.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I point out to the Senator from New Mexico that, under the committee amendment, if the President were to die and the Vice President, for example, were to take the office during leap year, he could be elected President at two succeeding elections, provided the President had died at such a time as to make the unexpired part of the deceased President's term run for 366 days. But if the President happened to die on a year that was not leap year, the Vice President could serve for only one succeeding term.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, I have very little more to say. I hope I have not been offensive to anyone in my remarks. I have been deadly in earnest. These things are so wrong. They could be handled so simply. I have the highest regard in the world for the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I know his intentions are good. I know his patriotism cannot be questioned.

Then, Mr. President, why bring up these questions? If an amendment to the Constitution is desired, why not adopt a simple amendment providing, "No President shall be elected twice"? Why not do that? That would cover everything that it is desired to cover.

But, no, Mr. President; it is the opinion of some Senators that we must deal in days and hours, trying to gain a petty, insignificant political advantage. What is to be gained by that? Mr. President, I do not think it is important at all that either the Democratic or the Republican Party win in the election in 1948. I am quite sure in my own mind that whoever is nominated on the Republican ticket in 1948 for President of the United States will be a loyal and patriotic American, with whom I could work without any regrets and without too much opposition. I feel the same way about whoever is nominated on the Democratic ticket at that time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. It occurred to me that the limitation might better be placed upon political parties, rather than upon individuals, because I have seen it happen that there have been three different Presidents during 12 years' time, and yet the result has been merely to change the person in the Executive office, rather than to change the policy or the philosophy, since the same fundamental political philosophy has continued.

So, Mr. President, if the proponents of this resolution desire to cure what they believe to be an evil, the limitation might better be placed upon parties, rather than upon individual candidates for the Presidency.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I wish now to conclude my remarks. I think it is quite true that during the past years the candidates on the Republican ticket have endorsed the fundamental philosophies for which we have argued. I do not think there is too much difference among us. I regret very much to see going out to the country the impression that we in the Congress argue and debate about inconsequential matters, because I accord to every Member of this body on the other side of the aisle the same full devotion to the United States which I claim for myself.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I am through; I yield the floor.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I simply wish to comment on some of the remarks the Senator from New Mexico has made. I am fully in sympathy with his solicitude about quibbling and disputing over minor matters, but I call his attention to the fact that the quibbling and disputing were started over the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] and practically all the quibbling and disputing which have occurred during recent days have come from those on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am about to propound a unanimous-consent request. However, before doing so, I wish to say a few words.

The debate which has taken place during the last hour—for this subject has been discussed today for only 1 hour—is similar to the debate which occurred at the time of the formation of the Republic, with one exception; namely, that in those days there was no insinuation that the debate was for political purposes. In those days the founding fathers saw the challenge which certainly those of us today who have eyes to see with, see now. The House saw it, and so indicated by voting by such a vast majority in favor of the joint resolution. Five or six or seven Senators saw it, and so indicated by submitting resolutions. In the subcommittee Democratic and Republican Senators saw it, and indicated as much by reporting this resolution. What they saw was simply that power vested too long in the hands of anyone is dangerous to the community and to the Nation.

Even President Roosevelt saw that, and even that great Democrat, Thomas Jefferson, saw it when he endorsed the two-term tradition, which has become the unwritten law of the land. He said:

> No pretext should ever be permitted to dispense with it—

He was referring to the principle of rotation in the Executive Office—

> Because there will never be a time when real difficulties will not exist to furnish a plausible pretext for dispensation.

When I quoted that language at the time when I opened the debate on this subject some days ago, I showed what the pretext was in the case of President Roosevelt.

No, Mr. President; we are not afraid of shadows. We are not even fearful of realities. But we feel it is our obligation to face them.

Under the joint resolution as passed by the House, and as it has been discussed here, provision is made that anyone who has occupied the Office of President of the United States during all, or portions, of any two terms, shall thereafter be ineligible to serve in that office in a succeeding term.

Under the Senate committee's version of the resolution, the Chief Executive might in one case serve for as long as 9 years.

Those who have read the debates which occurred in the early days of this Republic know that up to the very last the founding fathers debated the question whether the President should be eligible for only one term and whether such a term should be for 7 years. Mr. President, I have been glad to hear Senators on the other side of the aisle express their admiration for the founding fathers. Finally, in order to compromise and get things accomplished, the founding fathers left the question undecided. But the first President of the United States, George Washington, recognized the validity of the arguments and of the ideas which had been presented at that great period in our history, when our Nation was being formed; and he established the principle of not more than two terms for any President. The other founding fathers indicated their concurrence in that view.

Now we have arrived at a period in the history of the world in which we have seen demonstrated on a world scale how dangerous it is for power to gravitate into the hands of one man or one group. I do not think there should be any insinuation that partisanship or mere politics is responsible for the bringing of this resolution before the Senate. In the debate in the Committee on the Judiciary, I do not think partisan politics was ever mentioned. There was unanimity on this subject, with the exception of one member of the committee; and now, as I understand, even that Senator has indicated a desire to have the Congress legislate explicitly that those who serve in the office of Chief Executive of the Nation shall not serve for more than two terms.

So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote on the amendments and on the joint resolution on Wednesday at not later than 3 o'clock, and, if that is agreed to, I shall ask a recess be taken.

Mr. GREEN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GREEN. I have it in mind, when the proper time comes and I have an opportunity, to move to postpone action in this matter. May I make that motion now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be in order at the time the Senator is recognized.

Mr. GREEN. I have been recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senator from Wisconsin has the floor. The Chair understood the Senator to rise to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GREEN. Then, if I am forced to do so, I regretfully object.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, it may be impossible to agree on a time to vote, but I wish to say that in my opinion the matter before us is obviously not a partisan question. We cannot adopt the amendment unless the Democrats, or a large number of them, join in voting for it.

For years I have been in favor of limiting the presidential term either to 8 years or 6 years. We cannot get away from the complicated problem produced by the fact that a Vice President may serve a portion of a term after succeeding the President. So far as I am concerned, if this is taken in some way as an attack on President Truman, I am willing to except the present incumbent of the office. I am more interested in the general principle and not in that particular feature, if that is the basis of the charge of partisanship, because that certainly was not in mind.

I suggest that the Senate now adjourn, and it may be possible to work out, with those who favor the general principle, some compromise on this question, which may be taken up on Wednesday.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to remind Senators on the other side of the aisle that the Democrats have not taken too much time in the debate on the floor of the Senate this afternoon. So far as we are concerned, we would as soon go along and work this matter out tonight. We want the country to know that we are not in accord with what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] said a few days ago, after he came out of a conference, when he attempted to shift the responsibility for the failure to enact legislation onto the Democrats on this side of the Senate. Of course, that is not the case.

I know that there are some speeches to be made on this side, and I myself wish to say some things in connection with the pending measure. If Senators wish to have a night session, so far as I am concerned, we can have one, taking an hour for dinner, and returning and remaining here until 1 o'clock tomorrow morning, if necessary.

Mr. President, I should like to have something done in this Congress, so far as I am concerned, and I resent the fact that the Senator from Ohio saw fit to say, simply because we carried on for some 10 days—that is, every other day for 10 days—discussing the budget question, that the Democrats were attempting to delay action. We are not at all attempting to delay action.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly obvious that we will not be able to conclude the debate tonight. It is equally clear to me that we should dispose of the pending measure as soon as we can. The Senator from Ohio spoke of an adjournment. I suggest that the motion should be for a recess.

Mr. TAFT. I spoke carelessly. My only point is that it seems to me that if there is complete disagreement on the particular issue now before us, it will prevent the passage of the joint resolution, which I should like to see passed. It seemed to me that a recess might give an opportunity to reach some compromise with those who think the pending committee amendment cuts the tenure too short, and I thought we might do better by taking a recess than by going ahead to a vote tonight. However, I have no objection to a vote on the pending amendment, if the Senate wishes to take it. We can work the compromise out afterward.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I repeat, I see no object in continuing the session further. It is perfectly certain that we are not going to conclude the debate today. In addition to that, I am repeating and emphasizing that those of us upon this side of the aisle have an important meeting as we think, at 8 o'clock.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not think it will be nearly so important as passing the pending joint resolution. I do not know what the meeting is, of course.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have never seen such a case of jitters as are now so prevalent on the other side of the aisle. In all my experience, which goes back a number of years, I have never seen a party so much disturbed, so far ahead of a general election, over the possible consequences of it. I am now going to move that the Senate recess——

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Because of the fact that the pending amendment is my amendment, I was hoping we could get a vote on it tonight, unless there is to be more discussion. I do not know of any other Senator who desires to speak, and I should like to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I have understood quite differently as to those desiring to speak.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I did not know of any.

RECESS TO WEDNESDAY

Mr. WHITE. I now insist upon my motion that the Senate recess until 12 o'clock noon on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Wednesday, March 12, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Lawrence P. Gatti, assistant pastor, St. Stephen's Roman Catholic Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Heavenly Father, Almighty God, in whom the founding fathers of our country have directed that we should put all our trust, deign in Thy loving goodness to give guidance and protection to the Members of our Congress. Impart to each of them the wisdom of Thy ways.

May they, by Thy inspiration, have an ever-constant sense of their responsibility as servants of the people by whom they have been elected to office, and from whom they receive sustenance to work for the public welfare. Grant that the awareness of their civic trust may be deepened in their souls to the end that their statesmanship may redound to the credit of this Nation and benefit all our fellow citizens.

We pray, in particular, that Thy guiding light may shine forth upon today's deliberations that they may be useful toward the advancement of all interests that will produce internal peace and prosperity and make our country great among the peoples of the earth.

These blessings we ask of Thee, O Eternal Father, through Thy well-beloved Son, the blessed Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, March 6, 1947, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on March 7, 1947, the President approved and signed a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 122. Joint resolution to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to make provision for certain ocean transportation service to and from Alaska until July 1, 1948, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 28. Concurrent resolution providing for a joint session of the Congress on March 12, 1947.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1030) entitled "An act to continue in effect certain war-excise tax rates, and for other purposes."

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1947

Mr. TABER submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 1968) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, and for other purposes.

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES OF CONGRESS

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 28) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, March 12, 1947, at 1 p. m., for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

[Mr. MASON addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a very fine and timely editorial from the Detroit Free Press of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

FREDERICK OSBORN

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to adress the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Daily News of March 7, 1947, page 20, carries the report that Frederick Osborn, wartime chief of the Army's morale program, has been named as deputy United States representative on the United Nations Atomic and Disarmament Commission. This is the same man who headed the Army orientation courses under which tracts were issued to our armed forces justifying Soviet aggression against Finland, Poland, and China, validating the Stalin-Hitler Pact, praising the Soviet Union as a democracy, and denouncing our own system of private enterprise. Literature distributed to troops under Army orientation auspices included works by Maxwell S. Stewart, Owen Lattimore, and other well-known followers of the Communist Party line.

Orientation Fact Sheet No. 53 described the Soviet Union as having ultimate political ideals "directed opposite to the stated ideals of Fascist dictatorship, and their hope is to drop the appurtenances of dictatorship in the process of democratic evolution." We have only to witness what is happening in Poland, Hungary, and Yugoslavia under Soviet domination to see how misleading this is.

Owen Lattimore's book, The Making of Modern China, a part of the Army course library, calls the open-door policy "a further development of the permanent policy of hitch-hiking imperialism in a preference to active imperialism."

From this appointment and the proposed appointment of David Lilienthal, Herbert Marks, and others, it is clear that the administration is working hand-in-glove with those who make it a profession to be hoodwinked by the Communists, with those who are willing to go to any length to appease the Soviet dictator. I, for one, cannot let this appointment pass by without raising my voice in strenuous protest against it.

NEWSPRINT INVESTIGATION

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 59) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of the investigation and study to be conducted by the select committee created by House Resolution 58, not to exceed $25,000, including expenditures for the employment of investigators, attorneys, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 126) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of conducting the studies and investigations authorized by House Resolution 111, Eightieth Congress, incurred by the Committee on Education and Labor, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $40,000, including expenditures for printing and binding, employment of such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by said committee and signed by the chairman of the committee and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The official committee reporters may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SELECT COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING THE NATIONAL DEFENSE PROGRAM IN ITS RELATION TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 129) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there is authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House a sum not to exceed $2,706.07 on vouchers signed by the former chairman of the committee under authority of House Resolution 294 of the Seventy-seventh Congress, continued by House Resolution 17 of the Seventy-eighth Congress and House Resolution 64 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, and approved by the Committee on House Administration in order to pay outstanding debts incurred by the Select Committee Investigating the National Defense Program in its relation to small business in the United States.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ARNOLD (at the request of Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an address over the National Broadcasting Co. by Senator SALTONSTALL and myself on March 1.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

THE LATE CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks for 1 minute, revise and extend my remarks, and include two newspaper articles.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, today's news brings us word that yesterday a woman passed away who has done perhaps as much as any person to bring about recognition not only of women's rights but of her very grave responsibilities. For 38 years Carrie Chapman Catt fought against intolerance, inertia, and tradition, and the one-track mind. She was very much interested in bringing about a broader aspect of the idea that "a woman's place is in the home." I think she would agree with me that woman's place is in the home—yes, by all means—but now when a new era is being born that home has responsibilities of influence that reach around the world.

We deeply regret that she could not have lived longer with us, but we are grateful for the contribution she has made.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MERROW asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

AID TO GREECE AND TURKEY

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, from observations made and information received by visiting the countries in Europe, the Balkans, and the Middle East, I have been forced to the inescapable conclusion that there are two basic principles in the foreign policy of the Soviet Union. The first principle is expansion—during the war Russia added approximately 265,000 square miles of territory and 22,690,000 people to her already extensive domain. The second principle is the spreading of communism whenever and wherever possible. Even in the morning press, former Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles declares that the Communists are "attempting to destroy the inter-American system as it has been established."

Turkey and Greece, in the Mediterranean area, are the outposts against the march of communism to the west. These countries are in need. The issue is clearly drawn. The United States should extend aid to both Greece and Turkey or they, as many other countries have been, will be dominated by the Soviet Union. We must do this not for the purpose of underwriting the British Empire but for the purpose of preventing the spread of communism. By giving aid to Greece and Turkey we will help guarantee the security of the United States.

Greek Communists, trained in Yugoslavia and other Balkan states, take their orders from Moscow. If we do not assist Greece they will seize control of the nation. If this is allowed to happen, Soviet influence will rise rapidly in Turkey and in the Middle East.

There must be no diplomatic appeasement. This is an opportunity for us to exercise leadership. We have the ability, the prestige, and the power to halt the march of communism toward the west. We must act with determination. Let us keep constantly in mind that it will be far less expensive to act now than sometime in the future.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOLMES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech by Goodrich W. Lineweaver, of the Bureau of Reclamation.

Mr. MUNDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article pointing out that the propaganda sheet In Fact, published by one George Seldes, is a camouflaged Communist sheet.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after the conclusion of the legislative business of the day and any other special orders that may have been entered, I may address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

[Mr. POULSON addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an article by Joseph Alsop in the Washington Post of March 9.

[Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts addressed the House. Her remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the decision of the Supreme Court in the Lewis contempt case serves notice to the country and to the world that no man is bigger than the United States Government, and that no man is bigger than the President of the United States. President Truman's dealings with John L. Lewis show that he has the general public welfare at heart, and that he will not submit to being shoved around, kicked around, bullied, or browbeaten by any man who ignores the well-being of the general public and holds the President and the United States Government in contempt in order to further his own selfish ambitions. The people of this country are fast awakening to the realization that in Harry Truman we have a great man and a great President, who has the courage of his convictions and who will fight to his last breath for what he believes to be right and to the best interests of his people. As MacArthur returned to the Philippines in forty-four, so will Harry Truman return to the White House in forty-eight.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FORAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a memorial from the Oklahoma Senate.

Mr. SADOWSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two separate instances and to include therein excerpts.

Mr. HÉBERT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two separate instances, in one to include an article from the Times-Herald by Mr. James Walter and in the other to include some radio remarks by Mr. Lou Brodt.

Mr. KEFAUVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two separate instances and to include an editorial and some excerpts.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

[Mr. KEFAUVER addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

THE COPPER SITUATION

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the latter part of this week the House will have before it for consideration a measure introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON]. It is H. R. 1626. This measure proposes amendment of the United States Code in order to facilitate the importation of copper at the present time.

This measure is emergency legislation and because the Members of the House have been tied up pretty much in their committee work it may be that all will not be thoroughly familar with the urgent need for immediate passage of this measure. I sincerely hope my colleagues will take a few minutes during the next day or two to familiarize themselves with this measure—and what it proposes to do—so that there will be unanimous approval of H. R. 1626 when the House is asked to act.

Many factories and shops are faced with suspension of operations because of the very serious shortage of copper. Many branches of the copper industry will have to curtail operations drastically because there is not sufficient copper available to meet present demands. The lack of domestic copper has been made up for, to some extent, during the last year by releases of Government-owned stock-pile copper. This stock pile is down to the vanishing point. Imported copper has shrunk to a negligible quantity because of the 4-cent tariff.

Most manufacturers have already been informed by the suppliers of copper and copper-alloy materials that their shipments are to be drastically reduced, starting immediately, due to the fact that there is an insufficient amount of domestic copper available for processing.

This means the closing of some shops and a drastic reduction in personnel and working hours in others.

The measure introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON] will alleviate the harsh results of such a serious situation. If this measure is approved, the tariff on imported copper will be suspended until such time as the domestic sources are able to produce sufficient copper for the needs of the copper industry in this country.

In view of the seriousness of the situation, I appeal for the favorable consideration of all the Members of the House.

HARRY S. TRUMAN

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, Secretary Chase was a member of Lincoln's Cabinet during the War Between the States, and it is said of him that he was a far more brilliant man than the President, had more dignity, and a more prepossessing appearance but Chase is hardly remembered today while Abraham Lincoln is remembered as one of the greatest men of all time. We are told that the sole reason for this is that Abraham Lincoln had intellectual humility and a sense of humor. Such qualities as these are sometimes the difference that makes one man great and the others just ordinary men.

We have a man in the White House today as President of the United States who is modest, who is humble, who springs from the American people, and one who has the same type of intellectual humility. I wish to take this opportunity to commend President Harry S. Truman for his great battle last fall in behalf of all the American people rather than certain pressure groups. I am glad that the Supreme Court of this Nation in its decision last week saw fit to back up this noble stand by a typical American.

Also, this is my first opportunity to publicly commend Harry S. Truman for his great work in the closing days of World War II. Many of us who were en route from the European theater to the Pacific will always believe that the patience of President Truman in dealing with the Japanese envoys in the Pacific, who somehow never arrived in time, resulted in an early unconditional surrender of the Japs and saved thousands of American lives.

Harry S. Truman is growing, developing every hour, with the job, the burden and the duty that is his, and in his efforts to save our country in this hour of crises, he needs the support of loyal Americans of all parties and all faiths on a nonpartisan level.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PHILBIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a recent article from the Boston Post.

Mr. DURHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. PRICE of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a recent radio address.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

[Mr. DAVIS of Georgia addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS] be permitted to address the House for 1 hour on the subject of the rising cost of living.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

[Mr. SMATHERS addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

TERMINAL-LEAVE PAY

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Speaker, on January 3 the gentleman from Florida, Congressman ROGERS, introduced a bill permitting ex-GI's to cash their bonds issued for terminal-leave pay. More than 9 weeks have elapsed and no action has been taken on this bill by the committee to which it was referred.

Recently the gentleman from Florida, Congressman ROGERS, filed a discharge petition in this House, asking that the minimum required number of 218 Members sign the petition, to the end that the committee might be discharged and the bill brought before the House for immediate consideration and passage. I have signed this petition and I hope every Member will do likewise. It is nothing but fair and just that we take prompt action now.

When the officers of the Army were given terminal leave pay they were not required to accept bonds; neither were they required to wait nearly 2 years as some of the enlisted men have done to receive their cash. A great percentage of these boys need this money now. They can use it in construction of a home or the purchase of a business which will make them more secure in the future.

The money for these bonds is already in the budget. It will not change the plan of Government financing one iota. I sincerely hope there will be no further delay in bringing this bill before the House.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may meet this afternoon while the House is in session for consideration of House Joint Resolution 146 and other bills having to do with sugar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments be permitted to sit this afternoon while the House is in session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Alfred P. Sloan entitled "Which Way America?"

Mr. NORBLAD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and to include in one an editorial.

Mr. RAMEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances; to include in one an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor entitled "Division Among Justices," and in the other an editorial entitled "No Experts on Everything."

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

IMPORT TAX ON COPPER

Mr. KNUTSON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 2404) to suspend certain import taxes on copper (Rept. No. 108), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF ON WOOL

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the gentleman from Texas a few moments ago talking about the tariff. I wonder how much the gentleman from Texas would like to reduce the tariff on wool. They now have 34 cents a pound duty. Texas is one of the largest wool-growing States in the country, and I wonder what he and the people of Texas are going to do when they reduce the tariff. Does the Texas delegation want the tariff on wool reduced? The wool growers now want the Commodity Credit Corporation to buy all the wool in this country. They want the Government to lose 10, 15, and 20 cents a pound on it if necessary to maintain the price with the tariff, and I wonder just what the gentleman from Texas and these other fellows from the South who are depending on the Government to dig them out of the hole are going to do? They want subsidies on most everything. They want our industries to run; they want high labor standards. I ask you this, How will you maintain our standard of wages, how will you keep industries running. You buy all your goods from abroad. Who can buy it here? Where will your wages come from when industry is shut down? I say we must have a protective tariff or bang. They get the business and we get left in the lurch. I am for protective tariff for American labor and industry.

I further want to state here today that we must think hard, work fast, and make up our minds that we cannot finance any longer all the countries of the world. We are breaking down our own stability, weakening our Treasury, securing the enmity of the countries of the world. Snooping into other countries' business, men and women, I am for America first, last, and all the time, and I will not destroy America to save any country, large or small.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] that before our Committee on Agriculture came the finest type of gentlemen from Texas that I have ever seen, all supporting a plan to keep the tariff on wool. Maybe they would like to know what is going on here this morning?

THE LATE MRS. CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, the last of the veteran woman suffragists, Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, went to her reward March 9, 1947, at her home in New Rochelle, N. Y. During her entire lifetime, she was a pioneer and crusader for women's rights.

In my second term in the Illinois Legislature, it was my privilege to vote June 10, 1919, for the ratification of the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution granting women of the United States the right to vote, a cause which Mrs. Catt championed and crusaded for, and on the day the action of the Illinois Legislature was completed, at the request of some of the leaders of the woman's suffrage movement in Illinois, including Mrs. Catherine Waugh McCulloch, Mrs. Wirt E. Humphrey, and others, I sent Mrs. Catt telegraphic word of the action of our State. The nineteenth amendment was proposed by Congress June 4, 1919, and Illinois has the distinction of being one of the first three States which on June 10, 1919, ratified the amendment.

In a day when very few women were going to college, Mrs. Catt attended and graduated from the Iowa State College. She served as president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association and in 1911 made a world tour in behalf of woman suffrage. Shortly after the nineteenth amendment to the Constitution was ratified, Mrs. Catt was active in the organization of the National League of Women Voters and was its honorary president. She never ceased to work for women's rights and she will be long remembered by women everywhere for her contribution to their cause.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, I introduced House Resolution 21, to continue the Special Committee on Wildlife Conservation. I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday of next week, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a very interesting communication which I wish to call to the attention of the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a clipping from the Washington Post and also a clipping from the New York Times.

TARIFF ON COPPER

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, I was very much intrigued by the statement just made by my distinguished colleague from Colorado [Mr. HILL] and the colloquy between him and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

I had lost heart in the majority party. I thought they were going to depart from their traditional policy of a protective tariff. Since I have heard these two gentlemen, I feel very confident and sure now that this House will not reduce the tariff on copper.

INTERNATIONAL EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 167)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Acting Secretary of State on the operations of the Department of State under Section 32 (b) (2) of Public Law 584, 79th Congress, as required by that law.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 10, 1947.

[Enclosure: Report from the Acting Secretary of State concerning Public Law 584.]

ECONOMY AND TAX REDUCTION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Sunday papers carried the announcement that the leadership of the minority party had organized and were going to put into action not a goon squad, but General Gore's gorgeous flying squad of courageous and glorious guerrillas just to needle the Republicans and rejoice over an anticipated failure on the part of the Republicans to carry on a program of economy and tax reduction.

One of the orators of the squadron spoke this morning about taking care of the veterans. I think we are all in favor of that. I heartily agree with all that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DORN] said about Mr. Truman, and I endorse the gentleman's statement as to the President's ability, but my suggestion is that we take care of our present World War veterans before we start another war and get another crop of veterans by sending an army to Turkey and Greece, and again to every corner of the world to impose our ideas on all others. If we want to fight communism, we might start right here in Washington.

THE COPPER BILL

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to call up the bill, H. R. 2404, on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object if the printed hearings are available at the time the bill is considered.

Mr. KNUTSON. I amend my request accordingly, Mr. Speaker. We were told the printed hearings would be ready tomorrow and with that understanding I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to call up H. R. 2404 on Thursday.

Mr. FORAND. The truth of the matter is that we have had closed hearings on this bill. Several of the Members, I know, are opposed to it and are entitled to at least know what is in the hearings.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object unless the gentleman from Minnesota wishes to withdraw his request at this time.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1948

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2436) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate run throughout the day, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. D'ALESANDRO] and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, of course, but do I understand correctly that means the bill will not be read for amendment today?

Mr. CANFIELD. The first paragraph of the bill may perhaps be ready today.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2436, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 40 minutes.

It is a privilege to be chairman of the Subcommittee on Treasury and Post Office Appropriations, and I am proud of its membership—all earnest, serious-minded, patriotic men, determined to do the very best in the assignment that has been given us. Day and night for many weeks we have labored as a team. Always the work was priority No. 1. Some of us missed a roll call or two during the examination of witnesses. Members made personal sacrifices to attend many of the sessions, and this is especially true of the able and distinguished ranking minority Member, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. D'ALESANDRO]. In point of service on the subcommittee he is the senior member, and he has brought to the subcommittee a practical knowledge of the operations of government, an insistance on sound principles of economy and efficiency, and a spirit of cooperation. We have been fortunate to have serving with us the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], who, in addition to his many other capabilities, brought to the subcommittee the most exhaustive knowledge of the budget possessed by any one man in the Federal Government. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY], with many years of experience as a tax attorney, as State tax commissioner, and as a member of the old Post Office Committee of the House, contributed invaluable expert knowledge. Although new members of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GRIFFITHS], the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. ROBERTSON], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BATES], are experienced Members of Congress, have fine backgrounds for this work, have studied the problems involved, been faithful in attendance, and contributed a great deal to our work.

Midway in our labors we lost our courteous and able clerk, Mr. Jack McFall, who has left the Capital to take up duties in the Foreign Service. A real veteran in appropriations work, a wise and patient counselor, his departure is a real loss to Congress, and particularly to the Appropriations Committee. We have been fortunate in having the chairman assign to our subcommittee Mr. Claude Hobbs, who took off his coat to do a real job. Mr. George Harvey, clerk to the full committee, gave us the benefit of his years of experience.

The subcommittee's approach has never been partisan and the subcommittee was unanimous in its findings. The recommendations were unaltered by the full Appropriations Committee and the bill was reported to the House by unanimous vote.

The cry grows daily that the budget of the country be put in balance and a program of orderly debt reduction be instituted. Taxpayers are demanding relief. Mr. American Citizen is studying his government, appraising its functions, and watching his board of directors as never before. It is recognized that our way of life can be destroyed from within, that a solvent nation is the first and foremost bulwark against any enemies from without. Reports of wasteful expenditures and of employee indolence are morale-breaking. Action is demanded now. I feel that this bill is a step toward answering these demands. This is the first 1948 appropriation bill. It provides economy and serves efficiency. People are watching Congress today to see what action we take on this first bill. I believe the taxpayers will hail adoption of the bill as it was reported, and I am sure that we will have no justifiable complaint from the agencies involved that they are being hampered in their essential work.

It should be noted that the permanent appropriations of the Treasury Department include $587,560,000 for retirement on the public debt. This is the result of a statute passed after World War I, and I regret to have to report to the House that the Treasury Department has not, in past years, been making this mandatory debt reduction. Over $6,000,000,000 of this appropriation remains unused, as is brought out in the questioning of the Secretary of the Treasury by the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. The era of deficit financing has come to an end. It is time that the Treasury Department respected the spirit and the letter of Congress' dictates. The Bureau of the Budget expects to use only about $200,000,000 of the money Congress makes available for this sinking fund transaction this year. I sincerely hope that this estimate will be revised upwards at an early date and that in the future this law will be carried out.

Shortly before we began our hearings we learned of the so-called Morgenthau Diary incident. It was reported that public moneys may have been spent in the compilation. Papers needed by the Treasury were included therein. We requested the Secretary of the Treasury and members of his staff to tell us the story. Between the two appearances of the Secretary before the subcommittee the former Secretary, Mr. Morgenthau, volunteered to make all such papers available for inspection by the Treasury Department to determine whether any should be returned. We have reason to believe the committee may have been helpful in this decision. Meanwhile, we are urging the appropriate legislative committee to review the incident as developed in our committee's examination, which appears on pages 875–886, and 467–469 of the Treasury hearings, and page 4 of the post-office hearings. New law may be needed.

The subcommittee has called on the investigative staff of the full committee to look into the typewriter situation because of conflicting reports bearing on price, and rumors, all unconfirmed, that there is a large supply, new and used, in Government surplus stocks. Because of the ceiling price on typewriters written into this appropriation bill for many years, some of the companies are refusing to make offers.

Adoption of this bill will permit expenditures by the Treasury and Post Office Departments of $12,388,229,971. Of this, $10,857,496,721 is for the Treasury, and this includes $9,186,179,221, representing permanent appropriations for general and special funds, and trust funds such as old-age, survivors' and unemployment insurance, as well as $5,000,000,000 for interest on the public debt, all of which is beyond the control of the committee. Of the $1,671,317,500 carried in this bill for the Treasury, only $425,000,000 is for the actual operating expenses of the Department, and this amount represents a cut of 16 percent in the budget estimates. The bill carries $1,530,733,250 for the Post Office Department, and this amount will permit the continuation of present service in every respect. The Subcommittee on the Treasury and Post Office, in actions confirmed by the Appropriations Committee, has cut the estimates for operating expenses contained in the budget by $94,072,750, the refund of taxes and duties by $803,000,000, and is recommending an appropriation $159,538,982 less than 1947's.

Other than perfecting language recommended by the Bureau of the Budget, which has been inserted largely for clarification, or in a few instances to carry out provisions of laws passed by the Seventy-ninth Congress, the committee has not altered the general language of the bill, and the intents of the 1947 appropriation act have not been changed.

In the 1947 appropriations for the Treasury there were five indefinite appropriations, through which the Treasury was authorized to pay out "such sums as may be necessary." The Treasury estimated that it would pay out under these indefinite appropriations $2,050,700,000 in fiscal 1948. With a firm conviction that Congress should provide specific sums for stated functions and processes of government, reserving the right to modify any action as circumstances might dictate, the committee eliminated all indefinite appropriations and placed a specific amount for each item in the bill.

The largest of these appropriations was for refunding of internal-revenue collections. The Treasury estimated that $2,031,000,000 would be required for this purpose in 1948. Looking into the matter, the committee concluded that the estimate was excessive. On page 495 of the hearings you will find testimony of officials of the Bureau of Internal Revenue of this subject, and it will be noted that the Bureau could not entirely justify its estimates; that it was using assumptions not proved entirely correct. It was admitted their figure was only a guess. You will note that an allowance was made for refunding capital-stock taxes but the capital-stock tax was repealed in 1945, and certainly should be a dead issue by the time fiscal 1948 comes around. You will note that they expected the tax on distilled spirits to be decreased on July 1 next; but Congress has voted to continue present excise taxes. These distilled-spirits refunds alone were estimated to be $162,000,000, although less than $40,000,000 has been the normal expenditure in past years.

The Bureau expects that personal withholding-tax refunds will amount to $800,000,000, but it does not appear that the Bureau has taken into full consideration that the people are better educated regarding the tax returns, employers have had greater experience in this work, and the clerical and administrative personnel in the Bureau's field offices have had additional training and are better able to perform their duties. Secretary Snyder himself testified that they expected more efficient work from their employees in the Bureau as the result of added experience and training. You will also find in the hearings the statement by responsible Bureau of Internal Revenue officials that this $2,000,000,000 estimate was just a guess, and admission that the committee's guess might be just as good.

Taking into consideration the evidence given us, and after careful study, the committee believes that refunds of internal-revenue collections in 1948 will not exceed $1,231,000,000, and has therefore written an appropriation of that amount into the bill in place of the indefinite appropriation. We do not intend to leave the impression that this $800,000,000 reduction will save a single dollar for the taxpayers. The Government will still have to pay out whatever taxes are paid unnecessarily. We do feel, however, that it is sound business and in the interest of responsible Government financing, that the estimate should be as nearly correct as possible. We believe our figure is the more nearly correct, and should be used in budgetary computations.

The other major indefinite appropriation made specific was for refunds of customs collections, testimony regarding which appears on page 819 of the hearings. This is another item in which the expenditure is uncontrollable, but once more the committee feels that it has inserted a figure more nearly correct than that subcommittee for consideration in the President's budget. This has only been an indefinite appropriation for the past 3 years. The Customs Bureau requested $18,000,000 for this purpose in 1948, admitting that this figure was an estimate based on a belief that there would be an increase in foreign trade. This estimate did not seem to be borne out by testimony presented. The actual expenditures for the fiscal year 1946, the last year for which figures are available, was only $10,836,154. For the first 5 months of fiscal 1947 draw-backs and miscellaneous refunds ran well below estimates, although there was some increase over estimates in refunds on duties. The committee feels that the amount of the Bureau's estimated expenditures in 1947 will also be sufficient for 1948, and therefore has made a specific appropriation in that same amount, $15,000,000.

Other appropriations made definite were for refund of moneys erroneously collected, payment of certified claims, both in the amount of $700,000; and payment of unclaimed moneys, for which $100,000 is allowed.

For the actual operating funds of the Treasury, approximately $503,500,000 was requested. The committee has allowed about $425,000,000. Since this Department is largely a service agency, the reduction may be considered substantial. The 16-percent reduction involved here is in large part applied against personal services, and will cause a reduction in Federal employees. No exact figures on the number that will be released can be determined at this time, but the committee's report directs that those employees who cannot be retained in 1948 shall be dismissed now, so that their terminal-leave payments will be taken from 1947 appropriations. No allowance is made for terminal-leave payments to such employees in the 1948 appropriations, and the Appropriations Committee has voted that no deficiency request for this purpose will be considered. Personnel reductions in the Post Office Department will not be as extensive as in Treasury, and will be limited almost entirely to administrative personnel. These reductions will also have to be made immediately.

Last year this bill carried 57 separate items of Treasury appropriation. Despite the fact that 5 items were added to this bill through making definite the indefinite appropriations, there are only 48 items in this bill. Some appropriations were no longer necessary, and the Department recommended their elimination. A few things were added in accordance with laws passed by the Seventy-ninth Congress; the items added were those relating to the operation of the Federal Tort Claims Act and the requirement for separate appropriations for health services. There was one consolidation, whereby four appropriations were merged into one for greater efficiency and economy.

Of the 48 items appearing here for the Treasury, two exceed the estimates submitted, because of consolidations of accounts. Ten were given the same amount as requested, 17 were allowed more than they had in 1947, and 19 were cut below the 1947 level.

One of those which received an increase over the estimates was the general counsel of the Treasury, and this extra money was made necessary because the Office of Tax Legislative Council, the Division of Tax Research, and the Division of Research and Statistics, each of which had a separate appropriation in recent years, were placed under the Office of General Counsel.

The Division of Tax Research and the Tax Legislative Council have been making studies in wide fields, many of them overlapping, and no evidence was introduced proving the value of such studies. A review of the testimony given by the heads of these two offices will show duplication of effort. For example, on page 100 of the hearings, Mr. Shere, acting director of the Office of Tax Research, said in relation to personnel income taxes for the Federal Government in community-property States:

> We are working on the whole problem.

Mr. Surrey, the Tax Legislative Counsel, spoke on the same subject on page 128, and said:

> In the last year we have been reconsidering the matter.

On page 99 you will find this statement on tax research by Mr. Shere:

> In addition to servicing Treasury officials, studies prepared for that purpose also serve in connection with the Treasury's presentation of testimony to Congressional tax committees, the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee.

Compare this with Mr. Surrey's statement on page 117:

> We represent the Treasury Department before the Committees of Congress that deal with tax matters. These are primarily the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee.

I could cite other examples, but I think the case against these offices can be stated thus: On page 99 Mr. Shere made this statement:

> We assist the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

When Internal Revenue Commissioner Nunan was asked about these two offices, Tax Research and Tax Legislative Counsel, he said:

> As far as I am concerned, Mr. Congressman, I have never had occasion to use them.

The committee felt, since the funds for the Office of General Counsel were increased to provide for these three additional offices, that there will be ample money to conduct any legal and economic research necessary for immediate requirements. The consolidation will save $245,000.

The only other place where the estimates were increased was in a printing item for one of the divisions of the Bureau of Accounts. This was also due to consolidation, since all printing funds were concentrated in one account for the Bureau of Accounts, and this transfer involved no change in the total carried in the bill.

The total amount carried herein for the departmental offices under the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury is $9,017,000. This is a reduction of $719,500 from the estimates, and will force some cuts in personnel. The consolidations under the General Counsel comes under this heading.

Another cut under this heading was for the Division of Personnel, which has been increasing in size despite that fact that personnel work was being decentralized throughout the various parts of the Department. The reduction will force a further decentralization, but will leave this office sufficient funds to operate as a policy group on the departmental level. It might also be noted that this office was supposed to handle all complaints received about Treasury personnel alleged to be engaged in un-American activities. Since this program was put into effect 3 years ago, the Division received 352 complaints. Only one hearing was held, and that in November 1943. Certainly the Treasury has been most lax in this respect, and I would recommend a reading of pages 261 through 269 of the hearings by members of the Committee on Un-American Activities. It might also be said at this time that there is no un-American problem reported by the Post Office Department and the Postmaster General testified that there were no complaints in that agency.

A new item appearing in this bill for the first time, as the result of legislation passed by the Seventy-ninth Congress, was for health programs. In the past, health programs have been in effect, but for the Treasury they were taken care of by the Public Health Service, and no special funds were earmarked in previous Treasury appropriation bills. This had to be included this year, and the Department asked for $138,700. Since this is only for dispensary cases, it was believed that this figure was excessive, and $75,000 was finally allowed. In addition to showing that last year these dispensaries handled only 28 cases per day per unit, or 9 cases per day per health service employee, the testimony on this subject, appearing on pages 285 to 290 of the hearings, is highly interesting.

The largest single item under the Office of the Secretary is for penalty mail, and this will require $6,700,000 in 1948. The reason for this large sum, which is a little more than $2,000,000 over the 1947 figure, is due to the fact that the Treasury Department's Division of Disbursement mails out the checks for the Veterans' Administration and the Federal Security Agency, both of which will be sending out great numbers of checks in 1948. The additional pieces to be mailed in all in 1948 exceed the 1947 total by about 70,000,000. In 1948, the Veterans' Administration alone expects to mail out about 100,000,000 checks. The Bureau of Internal Revenue will send out 18,000,000 more checks than it did in 1947. The other part of this increased appropriation is due to the fact that the Post Office has ordered an increase in payments for handling penalty mail, this increase amounting to about 20 percent per thousand letters.

My colleagues on the subcommittee are going to tell you presently of the appropriations for the fiscal and enforcement branches of the Treasury Department, but I want to discuss for a few minutes the two largest reductions carried in this bill. Coast Guard estimates were cut $36,000,000, and Bureau of Internal Revenue, exclusive of refunds, $30,000,000.

The Coast Guard has sought to expand greatly in recent years, and the estimates submitted by this agency make it appear that while the President is seeking to unify the Army and the Navy, the Coast Guard is attempting to build itself up into a full and complete replacement for the independent Navy. The committee feels that the Coast Guard should be what the name implies; a Coast Guard, and not a small edition of a navy. Consequently, the committee has placed in this bill the sum of $97,000,000 for Coast Guard activities. This reduction is not as drastic as might appear, for the Treasury Department cut the Coast Guard's original estimates $61,000,000, and then the Bureau of the Budget cut them $38,000,000 more. In making its reduction, the committee has sought to eliminate funds which would permit the Coast Guard to operate far beyond the coasts of continental United States. We hope to cause a reduction in the great and disproportionate numbers of high-ranking officers, whose rank was created admittedly to keep pace with Navy protocol. We aim to prevent the construction of buildings not urgently needed, and which would draw construction materials from vitally needed housing programs. And above all we hope to force better administration of this agency. Some of my colleagues will, a little later, give you specific examples of the waste, the extravagance, and the grandiose schemes of the Coast Guard.

The committee has placed this ceiling of $97,000,000 for Coast Guard expenditures in the bill. It is pointed out that this amount is $72,000,000 more than its total appropriation just 10 years ago, for 1938. In setting this ceiling, we have permitted some elasticity so that the Coast Guard may administer reductions in the way it feels best. In past years, there have been nine separate appropriation items for Coast Guard. This year we have retained the language of each of the individual appropriation items, and have inserted a limitation on the expenditure for each. These limitations, if added up, amount to about $111,000,000, but since the ceiling on expenditures for over-all activities is $97,000,000, the Coast Guard itself will have to determine the points in which it will not spend up to the limitation. It may be that some items can be reduced rapidly and drastically, but that others will take longer, and cannot be cut too deeply. Thus this permissive authority, amounting to about $14,000,000, should permit orderly curtailments with the considerable latitude left to the agency.

It is not intended to reduce enlisted personnel below the 19,500 ceiling now in effect. There is a limitation of $70,000,000 for pay and allowances, and this is only $4,000,000 less than 1947. If the Coast Guard will carry out the intent of the bill, the reductions will be made in officer ranks. The committee feels that ample funds have been provided to permit continuation on the present scale, of Coast Guard search and rescue operations, including life-saving activities along the coast. There is enough money in this bill to permit maintenance of aids to navigation along the coast. The work of the Bureau of Merchant Marine Inspection should be unimpaired, although it will have to be better administered.

Where the cut will apply chiefly is to the blue water operations of the Coast Guard. One request which has been disallowed, for example, is the amount of nearly half a million dollars to build a storehouse for buoys in the Mariannas Islands. The Coast Guard will have to stop providing aids to navigation for the new Republic of the Philippines. We have not included funds, amounting to millions, for erection of loran stations in Alaska, where they would be of use only to the Navy for maneuvers. The Coast Guard will have to stop duplicating the research work being carried on by other Government agencies and private companies.

The Coast Guard will have to cease its overseas operations, but I can assure the Members of the House who represent coastal areas that, with efficient administration, the present work of the Coast Guard in the coastal waters of the United States can and will continue on its present basis.

A word about the reduction in administrative expenses of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, where $208,000,000 was requested, and $178,000,000 allowed. In 1947 internal-revenue collections dropped from $40,000,000,000 to $37,000,000,000. It is estimated by the Bureau that there will be a further drop in 1948 of $1,000,000,000, without including an even greater drop if Congress passed a tax reduction act. Yet the Bureau asks $34,000,000 more, and will have 3,000 more employees, for 1948 than it had in 1946. The percentage of taxes to be collected through enforcement activities in the 1948 estimates is less than 7 percent, compared with more than 8 percent in 1939 and 1940, when the appropriation was one-third of its present size. This makes it appear that we have reached the point of diminishing returns in appropriating for enforcement activities. If $174,000,000 and 50,000 employees were sufficient to collect $40,500,000,000 in taxes in 1946, certainly $178,000,000 and 53,000 employees should be sufficient to collect $36,000,000,000 in 1948.

is also a service agency. It is also one of the biggest businesses in the world. It is operating at a deficit which must be eliminated, but it can be eliminated only through both an increase in revenues and a reduction in expenditures, not one part of the equation alone. The Appropriations Committee has therefore recommended to the appropriate legislative committee that prompt consideration be given to the matter of increasing the revenues.

The estimated deficit in 1948 will be about $338,000,000, on the basis of appropriations carried in this bill and the revenues as estimated at present. Over $300,000,000 of this deficit will be caused by the pay increases for postal workers passed by the Seventy-ninth Congress. It can also be pointed out that revenues from handling penalty mail for Government agencies—for which the Post Office bills the various departments and agencies of the Government at the rate of $18.50 per thousand letters—are paid directly into the Treasury and are not credited as postal revenues. In 1946 it cost the Post Office Department $30,000,000 to handle this mail. It should also be noted that the Post Office Department is responsible for and charged with the expense of maintaining Federal buildings throughout the United States, and that in many instances these buildings are also occupied in part by other Government agencies which do not pay rent or bear any share in the cost of maintenance.

The amount carried in this bill for the Post Office Department is $14,000,000 below the estimates, but all reductions have been made without curtailing any service. The sum provided will make it necessary for the Post Office Department to provide strict administration, eliminating waste, and making full use of all its supplies and equipment. Certain surveys have been directed, so that the Department itself can suggest some retrenchment, and it is felt that in 1949 a lower amount will be necessary for the Post Office. Most of the savings made from the estimates have been made by denying requests for additional personnel, and by eliminating some activities that might have been desirable but were not necessary. No Member need worry, however, that the service now being supplied in his district, whether it be city delivery or rural delivery, will be impaired in the slightest. In fact, for the benefit of those living in areas served by rural delivery, provision has been made in the full amount requested by the Post Office Department for extensions of service.

No major cuts were made against the office of the Postmaster General nor in the departmental offices in Washington. It is expected, however, that some reduction in force will be required, particularly among personnel and public relations workers.

It is in the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General that economy can best be practiced, for this officer has charge of all post-office buildings, vehicles, and equipment. In reducing the estimates $3,493,000 this division will have less than it did in 1947. Equipment must be made to last longer, and supplies must be purchased with greater caution, while their use is more carefully supervised. Some work that is not necessary will have to be eliminated. A good part of the reduction was made because the request for over $5,000,000 for new equipment was considered excessive.

I believe that adoption of this bill in its present form will be an encouraging omen for taxpayers of the country, and will not be condemned as a ruthless slashing of the departments. It serves economy and preserves efficiency.

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to emphasize the fact that this bill is presented with a unanimous subcommittee report. We have worked together without divisions, without partisan bickerings, and with the sole intention of reporting an appropriation bill permitting the greatest possible service to the American people at the lowest possible cost. I believe we have succeeded. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD], serving for the first time as chairman of this subcommittee, has displayed a sense of fairness and justice on all occasions, worked hard, and has made an able leader, and it was a pleasure to work with him on this bill.

This is an economy bill. It is not wild, uncontrolled economy where estimates have been slashed without regard for service functions or public responsibilities. It does not contain the drastic cuts which have been rumored in the press. It is sane economy, necessary for the cause of good government, whereby unnecessarary expenditures have been eliminated and in some cases activities that are desirable but not essential have been curtailed. If this bill is adopted, the American taxpayer will find that his twin demands for continued service and reduced expenditures have been met.

This bill does not interfere with the permanent appropriations for the Treasury. The Department estimated that $9,186,179,221 will be required for general and special trust funds, including the old-age trust funds and the unemployment insurance funds, and the committee has not tampered with these figures. We did not change the Treasury's estimate that $5,000,000,000 will be needed to pay the interest on the public debt, although there were rumors that this amount was excessive.

The Bureau of the Public Debt, which handles this matter, has been allowed slightly less that $66,000,000, for fiscal 1948 for administrative purposes, and this does represent a reduction of about $3,500,000 from the estimates although it is almost the same figure as allowed in 1947. Pages 29 to 34 of the hearings on the Treasury bill contain figures on the public debt, giving a picture of the $257,600,000,000 debt as it was at the close of 1946. The administration of this debt is a mammoth undertaking, including as it does the sales of war bonds. In reducing the appropriation for this Bureau, the committee has specified that not more than $125,000 of the cut shall be applied against the Savings Bond Division, which is the Division promoting the sale of war bonds. This selling program requires constant encouragement and stimulation. The patriotic motives that caused people to buy bonds during the war is no longer so apparent. The desirability of buying these bonds as an investment must be emphasized. It should be pointed out that the administrative costs of selling these war bonds has been reduced to one twenty-third of one percent.

I should like to mention two other bureaus of the Treasury particularly at this time, for they are working branches of the Government which perform tremendously important functions, but which are all too often taken for granted. They are the Bureaus of Engraving and Printing, and of the Mint, and testimony regarding them makes interesting as well as informative reading. Such testimony appears on pages 384 through 439 of the hearings.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing designs, engraves, and prints securities, and other documents, currency and stamps for the United States Government, and for some foreign governments on a reimbursement basis. Our Government prints currency for the Cuban Government, and only recently completed an order for Siam. While several countries do have their own bureaus of engraving and printing, a great many buy their currency from private businesses, there being two or three companies in London and two in this country engaged in such work.

The Bureau submitted its estimates to the committee showing that there was expected to be some decline in the amount of nonreimbursable work during 1948, but that this would be offset by rising costs. One of the largest items making up this appropriation is for overtime, for which $1,300,000 was requested. Much of this overtime arises from the fact that other Government agencies send urgent and rush orders to the Bureau. Careful planning, perhaps through supervision by the Bureau of the Budget, should eliminate some of this overtime, and permit a sizable reduction in the amount paid. Demands of other agencies are one of the chief causes of overtime in the Treasury Department, and such demands should be reduced to an absolute minimum.

Turning to the Bureau of the Mint, you will find that we have allowed an appropriation of $6,467,500 for this service, which is an increase of slightly more than $200,000 from the 1947 figures. The estimates have been reduced by $719,000, but the amount carried in this bill is nearly three times the cost of this service in 1940. This increase is justified because costs of materials and costs of production have gone up. Wage increases have been granted to more than 2,000 people employed in the mints and assay offices, almost all of these people being union members. But the biggest cause of the increase has been the growing demand for coins. When the price of a nickel bar of candy goes from 5 cents to 6 cents that creates a demand for pennies. An increase of 1 cent in the price of a package of cigarettes adds to the demand. There have been many of these instances in the past year or two. The demand for coins has dropped somewhat from the peak year of 1945, but there still were 2,106,859,000 coins delivered by the mints in 1946. Over 71 percent of this total appropriation goes directly for coinage.

The amount carried in this bill for the mints will not cover the total expenditures of the mints in 1948, for there are large reimbursement items. Our mints make coins for some foreign countries. They make the medals used by our military services. For this work they are, of course, reimbursed. In 1946, the mints got, roughly, $5,000,000 from Congress, and collected $6,000,000 from other sources for outside work.

Too often we think of the Treasury as being nothing but a great big bank. These examples of the Bureaus of Engraving and the Mint show that there is a manufacturing side to this Department. It operates a tremendous detective agency in the Secret Service. It has a police force in the Bureau of Narcotics and the Bureau of Customs. Its work is complex throughout, and is not all bookkeeping and accounting. The committee has had to cover many fields to determine fair and just appropriations for all this work. The job has been done thoroughly, and with careful thought and study to each item. The amounts carried in this bill will permit the Treasury to carry on its high standards of service in all fields in fiscal 1948.

The Post Office Department has likewise received fair and most considerate treatment. The Postmaster General appeared before us, and gave us a frank and informed picture of the problems his Department faces. All members of the committee were impressed with the seriousness with which he has undertaken his duties, and the responsibility which he feels as the active head of one of the largest businesses in the world.

There is probably no other Government agency which operates in such direct contact with every citizen of the United States, and in every single part of the country. Our servicemen abroad look to the United States mail to bring them word of home. All our military leaders have told us of the great morale building done by mail during the war, and in a sense that morale is a mighty contributor to victory, the Post Office Department shouldered a tremendous burden.

The committee held exhaustive hearings on the Post Office Department, as it did on Treasury and has come to the conclusion that in 1948 the Department will be able to operate with a high degree of efficiency on $7,642,000 less than it has for the current year. Some of this reduction was suggested by the Department itself. In other places the committee disagreed with the departmental estimates and cut them. We made the best compromises we could. No mail carriers will be discharged, nor will any clerks. Pay increases and statutory promotions will be honored. No essential rural-delivery service, no vital star route, will be eliminated. But waste will have to be checked. New personnel will not be added. Administrative procedures will have to be streamlined.

Most people will be particularly interested in the field services of the First and Second Assistant Postmasters General, for these are the offices that deliver the mail. If the committee has erred in assigning funds for these two services, it has erred on the generous side, for no one would deliberately delay the mail or in any way imperil its rapid and safe dispatch. We have granted $87,470,000 for compensation to postmasters, an increase of $750,000 over the current year. We have increased the appropriation for assistant postmasters by $100,000, although we have not allowed any new positions, and have suggested to the appropriate legislative committee that study be given to the question of limiting appointments of assistant postmasters in the smaller second-class offices. We believe that it will be unnecessary to create any new clerkships in first- and second-class post offices, and that expenditures for overtime and substitute hire can be reduced by careful supervision, and we have lowered the estimates accordingly, although we granted $9,784,000 for salaries of clerks in these offices so that statutory promotions and pay increases can be made.

Only recently were clerks in third-class post offices placed in the classified service, and all these positions have not yet been covered into the civil service. The conversion to the classification system has proceeded more slowly than the Department expected, and will not meet the goal set for 1948, thus making unnecessary some of the money requested. However, $24,000,000 has been granted for this clerk hire, and this represents an increase of about half a million dollars.

The estimated obligations in salaries for city delivery carriers were about $288,000,000 in 1947. The committee has not seen fit to authorize any new positions, but we have added $7,300,000 to meet all salary increases and promotions according to law.

A full continuance of all present rural-delivery service, plus some extensions as required by law, will be permitted with the funds allowed this item—$129,167,000. The estimates submitted by the Department were lowered somewhat, since it was not believed that the requested 150 additional carriers were absolutely necessary.

I would like to call your special attention to the section of the report dealing with special-delivery service, and also to the testimony on this matter, which appears on pages 46, 49, and 118. This is a particular problem to the post office, because Congress has passed a law which has increased the costs a great deal, while at the same time leaving the efficiency of special-delivery service open to some criticism. We have asked that the legislative committee study the matter, and I have noted that the Post Office Department has submitted certain recommendations to Congress. Special-delivery messengers are no longer paid on a fee basis, but are now on salary. In addition, they are paid 75 cents an hour for the use of their cars. The appropriation carried in this bill is approximately the same as for 1947, but this represents a tremendous increase over a few years ago, due entirely to the new law.

In the field service of the Second Assistant Postmaster General we have had to increase the appropriation for star-route service because people are now charging the Government more to carry mail on these routes. We were able to effect some reductions in payments to railroads, because the volume of mail to be carried will probably decline in 1948. It should be noted at this point that the railroads just a week or so ago filed applications with the Interstate Commerce Commission, which fixes the rate the Government pays these carriers, for substantial increases. The Post Office has indicated to the committee its intention to fight any such increases.

The volume of air mail carried during this fiscal year has not been up to expectations, and the Department asked for about $11,000,000 less than it had this year. The amount appropriated in this bill is still somewhat above the expenditures for 1947.

I hope this bill will be passed by the House in its present form. It is fair to the departments involved and it is fair to the American taxpayers. No one should expect more.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BONNER. Yesterday in a radio discussion of this bill I heard the remark that the reduction to be effected in this bill with respect to the field workers of the Internal Revenue Bureau, that is, the inspectors and investigators of private tax returns, would be reflected in a loss to the Treasury greater than the saving effected. Is there any foundation for that statement?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BONNER. Did the gentleman hear that discussion?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I did not hear the discussion, but I had an idea the question would be raised. May I remind my friend that there are over 33,000 in the administrative service of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, as against only 26,000 on the enforcement end. There is a specific item in the report that the committee will not countenance a reduction in the enforcement personnel. We want them to get out of Washington some of these people in the administrative offices who are falling all over themselves. It is the particular design of the committee to see that the enforcement activity is preserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER].

Mr. BONNER. The gentleman from Maryland did not answer the question that I asked. Would the gentleman answer the question, and then would the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] comment on it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think that was the answer.

Mr. BONNER. Will the reduction you have made in this particular division of the Treasury reflect a loss or gain to the Treasury Department?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman will permit me to answer, the answer is simply that while revenue is going down, personnel is going up, and the amount that is achieved by enforcement activities percentage-wise is infinitely smaller than it was in that period from 1929 to 1936 when they had only a fraction of the employees they have in the Bureau of Internal Revenue at the present time.

Mr. BONNER. Do you direct the Internal Revenue to maintain their field staff and curtail their office staffs?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; we could not give them legislative direction in the bill, but we did write the appropriate provision in the report.

Mr. BONNER. Then there will be as much field inspection in the future as there has been in the past?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; and the committee feels that field investigations and enforcement activities ought to be a little more efficient than they are at the present time.

Mr. BONNER. I thank the gentleman and hope as I have been assured that the field force will be maintained and enlarged, for it is here that much revenue is gained for the Treasury.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. ROBERTSON], a member of the committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, as a new member of the Appropriations Committee, I am tremendously impressed with the remarkable leadership displayed by the chairman of the subcommittee, the Honorable GORDON CANFIELD. For a man comparatively new in the Congress, I am amazed at his grasp of the situation we have at hand today. He has done a most excellent job in piloting the committee through the hearings.

Those of us who are familiar with the work of the Appropriations Committee know it is one that calls for great capabilities in dealing with figures and detail. It calls for long hours of study before each day's hearings, and one must be adequately prepared in checking item by item, especially at a time when the Congress is committed to a reduction in the Federal expenditures.

He has been handsomely supported by our able colleague, the Honorable EVERETT DIRKSEN, who has had many years' experience on the Committee on Appropriations. His contribution, as is always the case, has been exceptional. The other members, some of whom are new—both Democrats and Republicans—have shown every disposition to be present and carry through the long, tedious days, day after day, and I am happy indeed, as we report this bill to the floor of Congress, to also be able to say that it is not a political bill, that it comes to the floor not with a divided report but rather with a unanimous report of both the Democrats and the Republicans. We have dealt with the conditions in this appropriation measure on a nonpolitical basis. This, the first of the appropriation bills on the floor, is the beginning of a new trend of events in our Nation.

It is a vastly easier program to hold hearings on appropriation bills and yield to the demands of the departments for an ever-increasing amount. It calls for greater study of all the items. When the question before us is one of reducing expenditures, it calls for diligence and a quality quite remarkable for the reason that as we cut expenditures we must be careful not to impair the necessary functions of the National Government. I shall touch briefly on a few points, in the time given me today, contained in the Treasury and Post Office Departments' appropriations.

In the Treasury and Post Office Departments there are five agencies engaging in whole or in part in law-enforcement activities. They are, naming them, the Secret Service, the Post Office Inspection Service, the Bureau of Narcotics, the Bureau of Customs, and also the Coast Guard, which was originally founded for this purpose, and it is placed under the Treasury Department because of its enforcement activities.

The Secret Service and the Postal Inspection Service rank with the finest enforcement groups in the world. In our effort in composing this bill the committee has been careful not to impair their work, nor the enforcement work of the other agencies. The Secret Service submitted requests for $3,465,100 but after a careful study, the committee found, in its wisdom, that this was higher than was necessary, and the amount therefore carried in this bill is $2,707,500, or $757,600 less than was requested. It is also $404,500 less than the Service has for the present fiscal year.

The principal function of the Secret Service, as you all understand, is the suppression of counterfeiting, and the excellent work it has done in this field can be found in the figures and statements appearing on pages 196 and 197 and on pages 222 to 226 of the hearings. It reveals that counterfeiting is much less today than it was 10 years ago due to the scarcity, perchance, of materials that are necessary to make fake coins and bills. There is today $20,000,000,000 more currency in circulation than there was in 1940 and 600,000,000 pieces of Government securities outstanding compared to less than 15,000,000 in 1940. While the number of securities outstanding would indicate the possibility of an increased number of forgery cases, the efficiency of the Service has been such that the number of cases in 1946 was slightly under the 1940 figures. The criminals are evidently learning that it does not pay to engage in counterfeiting or forgery of Government securities.

Included under the funds for suppression of counterfeiting is the protection of the President and members of his family. It may be that with the return of peacetime routine certain protective measures can be abandoned, but you will note that in the report the committee has specified, in reducing this expenditure, that none of the cut was to be applied against the funds used for the protection of the President and his family, unless the Secret Service itself determined that adequate protection could be given with less money. It is felt that the sum allowed for the suppression of counterfeiting and other crimes will be ample and will not, generally speaking, impair the efficiency of the Secret Service if carefully administered.

The White House Police force protects the White House and the grounds. The committee has made a reasonable reduction in this appropriation for this force, and it may be that the cut made will impair the work of the Service. However, this committee appropriated the full amount necessary to provide for a force of the size prescribed by law. There is a statute, the act of April 22, 1940, Third United States Code, page 62, that fixes the size of the White House Police force at 80 men, including officers. In past years the committee has written a provision into the appropriation bill stating that notwithstanding the provisions of this law, the force shall consist of 114 men. The committee is of the opinion that this was legislation in an appropriation bill, and would be subject to a point of order. We believe the proper recourse is for the Secret Service to ask the proper legislative committee to provide for a greater number of men, if it is deemed necessary to have them. The committee has eliminated this legislative phrase, and appropriated funds to pay the salaries of 80 men in accordance with the law.

The uniformed Secret Service also protects Treasury buildings. In the year 1939, $300,000 was sufficient for this purpose. In the year 1948 the Service asked for $849,700. It is true that some additional functions have been added in the past 9 years, but at the present time these additional functions are being eliminated. The committee considered the request this year to be excessive, and after great care and study, reduced it $130,000. All in all we have given the Secret Service for the fiscal year 1948 a sum that is equivalent to its appropriations in the war years. The war has been over almost 2 years and it seems to us of the committee that the Secret Service should be getting back to its peacetime size.

The Post Office's counterpart of Secret Service is the inspection service, and the committee, I feel, has been most generous here. We have granted the inspection service $125,900 more than it has for the present year, and we have only reduced the estimates $251,400.

There are four items which make up the appropriations for the inspection service. Two of them, travel expenses for inspectors and payment of rewards, are carried in the same amount as for 1947. This will actually cause some reduction in travel because the committee has eliminated from the bill provision that inspectors shall be paid 3 cents a mile for official travel in their privately owned cars. This will permit payment of 4 cents a mile under Public Law 600 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, and puts the inspectors on a par with other Government workers who have received the higher figure.

The item for salaries for inspectors is $198,300 higher in this bill than it is in 1947 and this will permit statutory promotions. The committee does not consider it necessary to create any new inspectors' positions and consequently it has not allowed any funds for that purpose.

Some reductions have been made in the appropriation for salaries of clerks at division headquarters. During the war these clerical staffs were built up at an unusually heavy rate. The committee feels that with the emergency now over, postal inspectors should be able to utilize clerks at local post offices on a part-time basis, reducing thereby the clerical work at division headquarters and eliminating some of the war-service personnel.

Enforcement activities of the Bureau of Narcotics received a good deal of notice in the press recently, when the Bureau forced the expulsion of an American ex-convict and deportee. Over a long period of years this Bureau, under Commissioner Harry J. Anslinger, has been doing a quiet but very efficient job. The funds allowed this agency in 1947 were approximately the same as 10 years ago, although this amount for this year has been increased $130,000 to allow in part for the pay increases voted by the Seventy-ninth Congress.

The testimony of Commissioner Anslinger appears on page 181 of the hearings, and is not only informative, it is very interesting. Narcotics agents comprise only 2 percent of the entire police forces of the country, yet they have provided 10 percent of the population of our Federal prisons. There is an increase in the number of violations of narcotics laws, and this Bureau is maintaining a record of getting convictions in 85 percent of its cases.

Narcotic control is not entirely a Federal problem. There must be a degree of control and enforcement by the States, and as the testimony shows, this is especially true of marihuana and the so-called sleeping powders. You will note on page 191 that Commissioner Anslinger declared:

> The control of sleeping powders should not be handled by the Federal Government.

We of the committee are of the opinion that it should remain a State function. Forty-four States do have uniform narcotic control acts, but only New York, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, California, and Florida have enforcement agencies. The Commissioner complimented the States that are doing this job, and indicated that there was full cooperation with the Federal Bureau, which does control importation, manufacture, and distribution.

In support of some reports of extravagances in our military expenditures, the Commissioner told the subcommittee a story. By virtue of his office he is custodian of all drugs and narcotics in possession of the Government, and has narcotics stock-piled in several places in the United States. There are great quantities of drugs in his storehouses. Yet not too long ago the War Department decided that it needed $15,000,000 worth of opium. Army officials did not consult the Commissioner, but prepared to make these purchases in the open market. Fortunately word of this intended action came to the Commissioner. He was able to tell the Army that he had this much opium in his surplus stocks, and as a result an unnecessary expenditure of $15,000,000 was eliminated.

We feel it will be of interest to have Dr. Anslinger's answer to this question:

> Has there been any increase toward addiction among the veterans?

His answer was:

> I am happy to say that right now, from what we know, we can count them on our fingers.

At the time the Bureau of Customs was up for consideration by the committee, the Attorney General made an observation in which he suggested that some of our law-enforcement agencies could be consolidated, and one of his ideas was to combine the border patrol of the Immigration and Naturalization Service with the border patrol of the Bureau of Customs. The committee feels that such a plan has genuine merit. As the report points out, one man can be given the dual responsibility to patrol against violations of either customs or immigration laws, and there is little justification for having two sets of officers patroling the same sections of the Canadian and Mexican borders.

This is just one place, and a symbol, if you please, in which entrenchment might be made by Customs. Another is in the Foreign Service, and there was little evidence to show that all of the Customs work abroad could not be handled by the regular diplomatic and Foreign Service agencies of our Government.

We have been mindful of the fact that peace has resulted in the restoration of foreign trade. The wartime development of air transport has increased the Customs problems. The work load of this agency is increasing. But the Customs Bureau came before us and asked for $10,000,000 more than they have in 1947, and offered no plans for consolidating their work or perfecting their administration, or otherwise directing their efforts toward any safe economies. The committee can see, we believe, where there might be savings. I have here alluded to two of them a few moments ago. We, the committee, therefore consider the estimates of the Bureau excessive, but we did permit $3,000,000 more than in 1947 to take up the added work load. The tables appearing on pages 793 through 796 bear testimony of this work-load increase.

Every Member should read carefully the testimony of the Coast Guard officials, starting on page 570 of the hearings. First, you might refer to a statement by Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, which appears on page 17. This reads, and I quote:

> The functions the Coast Guard performs are of a nonmilitary nature.

Parenthetically, that would set at rest any feeling that this reduction in the appropriations for the Coast Guard is a cut in national defense.

> The functions the Coast Guard performs are of a nonmilitary nature. Their policing is in connection with the customs operation and not as a military operation particularly.

It does not appear that the Coast Guard has advised the Secretary of its intentions. The estimates submitted to the committee calling for $133,000,000 would have permitted establishment of a miniature navy. One can only imagine what plans the Coast Guard had in mind when it originally asked the Treasury budget officer for $232,000,000.

Even if the estimates submitted to the committee were approved, we would have had a small navy with a vast preponderance of high brass. On page 579 it is brought out that there would be one officer for every six enlisted men. I refer to the table on page 587, which shows the percentage of commissioned and warrant officers to enlisted personnel. For 1947 this was 14.3 percent. You will note that the Coast Guard has this tendency after every war, for in the early 1920's the percentage was about the same, but that during the war it dropped to less than 6 percent.

On the same page Captain Richmond, Chief of the Planning and Control Staff, admits that when they have to reduce personnel in the Coast Guard they let the enlisted men go and keep the admirals. It is not the admirals who man the lifeboats to go to the assistance of ships and lives along our coasts. Captains and commodores do not tend the buoys and other aids to navigation. Flag officers do not man the lighthouses. The past procedure of this service in making personnel reductions must be reversed. Yet this very year the Coast Guard came before the committee and asked permission to make six new admirals next year. Look at the statements on page 627. In the Commandant's headquarters in Washington there are eight officers for every enlisted man.

One more point on this topic: We asked Admiral Farley, the Commandant, why he needed 23 more flag officers in 1948 than there were in 1940. His answer was that the Coast Guard had to keep up with Navy protocol.

I urge you not to miss the tables on pages 593 and 600 of the hearings. Here the Coast Guard has listed the distance from its bases to the nearest Army and Navy bases. One of the arguments advanced for merging the Army and Navy has been to eliminate duplication of facilities in the immediate area. The table of page 600 shows that in many instances the Coast Guard has duplicated Navy base facilities. Twenty Coast Guard bases are listed. Eleven of them are within 10 miles of a Navy base. In Norfolk, Va., a Coast Guard base is adjacent to a Navy base. In Boston, such bases are three-tenths of a mile apart. In Little Creek, Va., they are only one-tenth of a mile apart.

Out in San Diego, Calif., the Coast Guard has built an air base only 2½ miles from a large Navy air base. In San Francisco, Navy and Coast Guard air bases are within 12 miles of each other. Up in Boston, they are 20 miles apart. And you must bear in mind that the Coast Guard has only 110 operational planes.

The chairman of the subcommittee has touched on the deep-sea operations of the Coast Guard. Added altogether we have a sordid story of bureaucratic expansion at its worst. The cut the committee has made is in my personal judgment completely justified beyond question.

In conclusion, I should like to say to the Members of this Congress that the Appropriations Committee is confronted with a difficult task. We must find the common ground in our endeavors where the taxpayers who support the Government and the spenders recognize the responsibilities of each other. In my personal judgment the taxpayers have 51 percent of the stock in this American corporation.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mrs. BOLTON. In the matter of the Coast Guard, have you made so much cut in that that our own coast will lose some of the already restricted service of that agency?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am of the opinion that we have not. I am of the opinion that the Coast Guard has been amply provided for in our appropriation.

Mrs. BOLTON. On Lake Erie, near which I live, we are very definitely short of personnel. We have had some very disastrous happenings because the Coast Guard could not be reached, and there were not two boats to go.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. Is it not true that we are bringing the Coast Guard back home to do the things for which the Coast Guard was created, and, therefore, it can do the thing that the gentlewoman has in mind and do it properly and efficiently. Sufficient money for this purpose is incorporated in the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I thank the chairman. I was going to answer the gentlewoman and say that her difficulty had probably arisen because the Coast Guard was part of the Navy and probably away from her section of the country when it was needed.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, does the Coast Guard have anything to do with the Narcotics Division?

Mr. ROBERTSON. No.

Mrs. BOLTON. Do they make any contribution to the apprehension of these violators?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, it would only be in case the Narcotics Division would call on them that they would have that function, but as such they do not pursue it.

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY].

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, may I at the beginning pay my tribute to the chairman of our subcommittee, the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. GORDON CANFIELD. Serving for the first time as the chairman of the committee, in my judgment he has done a magnificent job. He showed a thorough acquaintance with the various items of appropriation, which evidenced a deep study of the bill before us. I know that he worked for many hours in order that he might be prepared to examine the various witnesses as they appeared before the committee. He exhibited a quick understanding of the problems which were presented, and throughout the entire hearings he was eminently fair to the minority as well as the majority members.

May I also pay my tribute to the executive secretary of the committee, Mr. Jack McFall, who served with the committee when we were considering the appropriations for the Treasury Department. He is a clerk of long standing in this House. His knowledge and experience were invaluable to the committee. It was a matter of deepest regret to each one of us that he was forced to relinquish his labors after the Treasury hearings had been concluded to accept a position with the State Department, where he will serve in the Foreign Service. Our committee's loss, however, was the State Department's gain. Notwithstanding the fact that he had relinquished his duties with the committee, he collaborated in drafting that portion of its report relating to the Treasury Department.

Mr. McFall was succeeded as executive secretary of the committee by Mr. Claude Hobbs, a newcomer, who shows every evidence of possessing the necessary ability to qualify him as a valuable addition to the staff of the Committee on Appropriations.

While it may be somewhat unusual, I like to give recognition where recognition is due. Mr. Palmer Murphy, who is Mr. CANFIELD's personal secretary, also rendered invaluable service to the committee. I do not believe we would have passed the transition period from one executive secretary to another so smoothly if Mr. Murphy had not been following the proceedings of the committee so closely that he was able to assist the new secretary in his work.

The members of the committee have all labored diligently and well. The ranking minority member the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. D'ALESANDRO], displayed a high caliber of leadership.

May I say Mr. Chairman, with all candor that I do not think the committee as a whole has done such a bad job on this bill. Personally, I am committed to a program of reduction in public expenditures. Last fall when I ran for reelection, one of my campaign pledges was that I would do everything I could to reduce public expenditures to an absolute minimum compatible with efficient governmental service. I hope we have done that in this bill.

This is a difficult bill. In the first place, we are dealing with the Treasury Department. The estimates submitted in the President's budget for the Treasury Department were $11,740,000,000. Of that amount, however, $9,186,000,000 was for permanent appropriations which are beyond the control of the committee. These permanent appropriations are made up of such items as interest on the public debt of $5,000,000,000. The committee could not change that item regardless of the wishes of its members. We have borrowed the money from various sources, and we must not only pay back the principal in time but we must keep up the current interest payment annually. Another item of permanent appropriations is the $3,500,000,000 expenditure from trust funds, such as the social-security fund, which the committee could not touch.

In addition, there are certain indefinite appropriations, which total over $2,000,000,000. They cover such items as tax and custom refunds. In a measure, these items also are beyond the reach of the committee. However, the committee decided on the basis of the evidence before it that these appropriations had been overestimated and it reduced the estimates of the indefinite appropriations by $802,000,000. I want to be perfectly frank to the Members of this House. I do not think this reduction saved the American taxpayers one single penny. Because these refunds represent overpayments in taxes and customs which must be returned to the taxpayer regardless of the appropriation contained in the bill. If the estimates of the committee are correct there will be $803,000,000 less paid out than was contemplated by the President's budget, but there will be no saving, because if we appropriated $2,049,000,000 as requested, and the refunds amount to only $1,246,000,000, the balance would remain unexpended. What the committee has done is to make a reestimate of the items based upon the evidence before the committee.

When you deduct the permanent appropriations and the indefinite appropriations you have left the operating expenses of the Treasury Department which constitute a relatively small portion of the total. Here again you are faced with a grave dilemma, because we know that people of this country want Federal expenditures reduced as much as is possible. Yet, the Treasury Department is the revenue-raising department, and if you reduce expenditures too drastically you will curtail the activities and efficiency of the Department to the point that revenues will be reduced also. In other words, there is always the danger that you will kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. What we tried to do in this bill, therefore, was to strike an even balance between expenditures and needs of the Department.

We made a very substantial cut in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The reduction, however, is not quite as large as it was at one time during our deliberations. I became somewhat apprehensive that perhaps we had gone too far and might impair the efficiency of the Bureau. At my suggestion the committee went back and reconsidered the appropriation, and added some additional funds to it. I hope and believe that our final figure is fair and reasonable.

I was somewhat apprehensive about the Coast Guard, in whose appropriation we made a substantial cut. However, there is but one way to reduce expenditures and that is to reduce them. The facts are that the Coast Guard has expanded tremendously during the war. The committee felt that the time has come when we should begin to retract and to eliminate some of the war activities.

With reference to the Post Office Department, this is one of the oldest departments of the Government. It is conducting one of the largest businesses in the United States. This business consists of rendering to the people of this Nation a service which must be maintained at a very high degree of efficiency. I believe I can say that every member of this subcommittee was impressed with the efficiency of the Department. We did not find a single bureau in which there appeared to be any extravagance or waste, and yet we felt that certainly there could be a token cut in the Department, which is all that has been made.

We have reduced the estimated expenditures of the Post Office Department less than 1 percent. The budget estimates for the Department were $1,545,000,000. We reduced them only $14,356,000.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. That is the total amount of savings in the Post Office Department?

Mr. GARY. To be exact, the budget estimate for 1948—and these figures may be found on page 41 of the report—were $1,545,089,250. The committee recommends $1,530,733,250, a reduction of $14,356,000.

Mr. DINGELL. That is very far from what we expected in the matter of savings. I had understood they were going to take 500,000 employees away from the Post Office Department out of the 541,000 total they had. Did not we hear that at one time?

Mr. GARY. May I say to the gentleman from Michigan that so far as I personally am concerned I am not half so much interested in the legislative budget or in the remarks that are made with reference to it as I am in the appropriation bills that come before this House. I prefer to base appropriations upon committee investigations rather than legislative guessing. What our committee has done is to examine this bill with the idea of reducing it as much as we possibly could without impairing the Government service and without reference to the legislative budget or any remarks that have been made with reference to it.

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman misunderstands my remarks in this instance.

Mr. GARY. I understand the gentleman.

Mr. DINGELL. I say the sum total of the savings will be about $14,000,000.

Mr. GARY. In the Post Office Department, it will be $14,356,000.

Mr. DINGELL. From what I had heard heretofore we were going to dismiss about 500,000 of the 540,000 employees of the Post Office.

Mr. GARY. We did not do that; we did not think it could be done. Moreover our savings insofar as the Treasury Department is concerned, the actual savings are approximately $80,000,000. So in the combined Treasury-Post Office bills we have saved approximately $95,000,000.

Mr. DINGELL. In other words, this saving is not going to amount to much as far as the individual taxpayer is concerned, any more than the cut in the budget estimate covering tax refunds. Is not that so? In other words, it is not going to mean very much.

Mr. GARY. The cut in the budget estimates concerning refunds is $800,000,000. We have only saved $95,000,000.

Mr. DINGELL. That is just a paper saving?

Mr. GARY. I did not say it was a saving. I said the cut in the estimate was $800,000,000. I have insisted from the beginning there is no saving.

Mr. DINGELL. That is right. Then the gentleman's mind and mine agree.

Mr. GARY. That is right.

Mr. DINGELL. We are striking at a figure in the budget estimate covering refunds, but it does not mean any savings.

Mr. GARY. There was no figure in the budget, but there were estimates as to what the refunds would be. We wrote a figure into the bill. We did make it a definite rather than an indefinite appropriation.

Mr. DINGELL. It will have to be whatever the amount is, will it not?

Mr. GARY. If our estimates are below the actual refunds that are required, it will have to be taken care of through deficiency appropriations.

Mr. DINGELL. That is right.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not want the RECORD to show that the committee agrees there will be no money saved here because I think I can show and propose to show after awhile in my own time as to where this saving actually is.

Mr. DINGELL. In the figures covering refunds?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very definitely in the refunds.

Mr. DINGELL. Then it means that Uncle Sam is collecting something he is not entitled to?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No, indeed. Uncle Sam has not collected anything he is not entitled to. Somebody has overstated the case in the budget and let it be reflected in the fiscal year 1948, perhaps for the purpose of not having to show an equivalent amount or anything like it in the budget for 1949. However, I will discuss that in my own time.

Mr. DINGELL. Very well.

Mr. GARY. I made the statement previously that there was evidence before the committee that the entire amount requested would not be necessary. However, I do not regard any change in that figure as an actual saving of expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I would like to bring the gentleman back, with his permission, to the reduction in the Post Office Department. As I understand the report and the gentleman's statement, the bill contains appropriations which are $14,356,000 less than the budget estimate.

Mr. GARY. That is correct.

Mr. GORE. The gentleman knows that the same subcommittee on which he now serves last year reported a bill $19,000,000 under the budget estimate.

Mr. GARY. I was not a member of the committee last year, and am not familiar with the amounts reported then.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There came to the Appropriations Committee just a day or two ago a deficiency estimate for $32,000,000 for the current fiscal year 1947. So when you contemplate that, then match it against the cut in 1947 and the proposed cut in 1948 I think it is pretty apparent this subcommittee has done a very good job.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. The gentleman from Illinois speaks of proposed cuts and proposals. I am speaking of what this subcommittee did last year and this year. This year you bring in a bill which is $14,000,000 under the budget estimate. Last year the same committee brought in the same bill or a bill on the same subject $19,000,000 under the budget estimate.

Mr. GARY. May I say that this committee worked on the bill before it. It did not consider last year's bill. I think it has done a very good job with the $14,000,000 reduction.

Mr. GORE. I was not undertaking to criticize the gentleman's committee. I think he did a conscientious job on the Post Office Department bill, but when you go into it you find that all of the proposals that had been made heretofore could not be lived up to and still give to the people rural mail service, city delivery, air mail service and rail transportation of the mail.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the subcommittee could have whacked out $100,000,000, but this subcommittee does not propose to do what has been done in previous Congresses, and that is to legislate by deficiencies. We mean to make it stick and to make it a real worth while estimate.

Mr. DINGELL. Nineteen hundred and forty-eight has not come around yet, so there is no deficiency.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Exactly. But we are anticipating 1948, and in the hearing it was very conclusively shown——

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman from Illinois knows that you do not act on deficiencies as a justification for this.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Please let me continue. The Post Office officials said this is the best hearing that they have had on Capitol Hill in 20 years, as an indication of the care with which this committee approached its responsibilities, and it wants to make sure that it does not come back here for millions and millions of dollars at some time in the future.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The question that disturbs me is—and I am getting a good many protests—that they are attempting to balance the budget, we might say, on the farmers who are being denied rural electrification. Now, we could go to those farmhouses when the draft was on to get the boys to fight this war, and I am opposed to cutting one dollar off what is necessary to extend rural electrification to the farmhouses of this Nation.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I have received quite a number of letters recently about growing towns down in my section of the State that want rural delivery such as cities have been enjoying for many years. They come back and say, "We do not have the money to give the people this service." In my district the Post Office Department wants to make some of our temporary carriers permanent. But they say, "We do not have the money." Now, I want to know what you have done in this appropriation with reference to giving enough money to give the people back home the service that those people are entitled to; that is what I want to know.

Mr. GARY. We have given the Post Office Department nearly everything they have asked for. We have cut their appropriation less than 1 percent.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Does the gentleman have a break-down to give some of the figures?

Mr. GARY. Yes.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. What are you doing for rural delivery? I would like to know that because I am going to write these people where the trouble is and why they are not getting the service.

Mr. GARY. As to the rural delivery service, the budget estimate for 1948 was $129,367,000. We recommend in this bill $129,167,000, which is a cut of only $200,000.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Now, just a moment. You had evidence before your committee, if you tried to get the facts, that they did not have enough money to give the type of service that was needed throughout the country, because they have not had the money, and that is why we are not getting it. Now, I have concrete cases; I know what I am talking about.

Mr. GARY. All I can do is to speak from the record.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Why did you cut them?

Mr. GARY. Let me answer the gentleman's question, please, sir. The budget estimate for rural-delivery service was $2,759,000 less than appropriations for 1947. The 1947 appropriation and estimated deficiencies were $132,126,000. The Post Office Department only asked for $129,367,000 for 1948, and we gave them all of it except $200,000, and I dare say that is the smallest percentage cut that will be made in any item probably during this entire session.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. What did you do for city delivery? My towns have grown down there 100 percent in some instances. They are entitled to it.

Mr. GARY. They asked for $295,638,000, and we gave them $295,300,000, thereby cutting the budget estimate $338,000.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Here is the point I want to get over: Rural delivery is growing, because when you build roads you make it possible for people to use them and they are entitled to that service under the established policy of this Government, and that same thing is true with your cities, where they grow; they are entitled to this service. They are entitled to it because other cities have been having it for many years.

The point is, if there is not enough money to expand that service I want to see that the people know where that cut comes from. A cut along that line is not justified unless there is strong evidence to support it. You have plenty of money to carry out that program. The people are entitled to that service.

Mr. GARY. May I say to the gentleman that there has been practically no cut at all. I stated in my opening remarks that this committee is fully cognizant of the fact that the Post Office Department is rendering a service which must be maintained at the very highest peak of efficiency, and we governed ourselves accordingly. That is the reason the cut in the Post Office appropriations has been only $14,356,000.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. What did the budget call for on these items?

Mr. GARY. In one case the budget estimate called for $129,367,000, and we cut that item only $200,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. For the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri, let me read the last three lines of this paragraph, on page 38:

> Necessary expenses of the rural delivery service, $129,167,000, of which not less than $200,000 shall be available for extensions and new service.

That is written in the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The trouble is that the Bureau of the Budget undertakes to cut down on the funds necessary for the extension of rural free delivery. I am not in favor of the budget legislating for me, as far as I am concerned. I have always taken that attitude. I am getting letters from the Post Office Department saying that these extensions of rural routes have been provided and allowed; they have been approved, but we cannot get money to make the extensions. While we are taking care of everybody else under the shining sun, it seems to me that regardless of the attitude of the Bureau of the Budget we could provide funds to extend rural letter service to those homes that we visited with the draft to get men to fight this war. I do not care what the Bureau of the Budget says about it; I am in favor of providing the funds to extend rural electrification and rural free delivery both to every farmhouse in America.

Mr. GARY. I think this committee has done just that. If we have erred it has been an error of the head and not of the heart, because I personally do not yield to the gentleman from Mississippi or to any other Member of the House in my desire to furnish the people of this country the proper rural mail delivery.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman I was not criticizing the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GARY. I understood that.

I think it is fair to say, Mr. Chairman, that under the recommendations in this bill it is estimated there will be during the next fiscal year a deficit of $335,000,000 in the Post Office Department. We hear a lot of talk of subsidies. That deficit of $335,000.000 means that the Government is subsidizing certain users of the mail approximately $235,000,000, as it is estimated that it costs about $100,000,000 to carry the Government's free mail.

The House attempted to remedy that situation last year. Before I was appointed to the Committee on Appropriations I had the privilege of serving as a member of the Post Office Committee. I sat on that committee when we reviewed a study that had been made by experts brought into the Post Office Department to determine what changes should be made in the rates of the mail service to put the department on a self-sustaining basis. After lengthy hearings, the committee reported out a bill to increase the rates on catalogs. It passed the House by a very large majority. We then reported out a bill to increase parcel-post rates. That bill also passed the House by a very large majority. We then held hearings on the rates on books, but since the two bills we had passed were resting quietly in the committee of the other body and no action was being taken, further hearings were suspended and no other bills were reported out.

Another study has been made and the Post Office Department has submitted certain recommendations to the Congress with reference to rates. If we are really serious in wanting to put the Post Office Department on a self-sustaining basis, we will have an opportunity to do so later in the session when bills providing for increased rates will be presented to the House. I think we should give those matters very serious consideration because there is at the present time only one classification of mail that is paying its way, and that is the first-class mail, which is more than paying its way. What we should do is to raise the rates on the classifications which are being subsidized at the present time, and thus put the Post Office Department on a self-sustaining basis.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. RIZLEY].

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Chairman, for weeks and months last year the Federal Power Commission held hearings throughout the country in respect to natural gas and the natural-gas industry. Their report to the Congress as a result of these hearings is long overdue.

Friday of last week, however, several days after I had introduced H. R. 2185, which would spell out their authority under the Natural Gas Act, and after similar bills were introduced by Representatives CARSON, of Ohio, and DAVIS, of Tennessee, and by Senators MOORE, of Oklahoma, and FERGUSON, of Michigan, they issued what purports to be a staff report accompanied by press releases, which in part agrees with one of the main purposes and objectives of my bill.

The report and the press releases disclaim authority of the FPC over the production and gathering of natural gas. Such disclaimer would not now be necessary had the Commission followed the clear intent of Congress as expressed in the Natural Gas Act. Production and gathering of gas in the field of its origin have always been recognized by the Congress as matters to be regulated by the several States. Production and gathering are inseparable from conservation of oil and gas, and conservation has always been held to be a prerogative of the State.

If the logic and reasoning in the so-called staff report is sound, then certainly the need for one of the main provisions contained in the legislation which the other Members of Congress and I have offered is obvious; namely, the provision specifically excluding from FPC jurisdiction the production and gathering activities and sales of natural gas.

The staff report admits that Congress never intended that the FPC have jurisdiction over these activities, but the same report likewise reveals that the Commission has in the past reached out and taken jurisdiction in questionable cases. The report goes on to say that the situation could be clarified better by administrative action of the FPC than by legislative action by the Congress.

If the FPC is to be given this power and authority without congressional direction, just how far would it go in excluding production and gathering from its jurisdiction, since it says that definite standards cannot be specified in advance of a study of the facts in each individual case? Would any responsible individual, be he producer or gatherer, be satisfied with any such proposal? Those who sell their gas to the interstate pipe lines would have no way of knowing whether or when FPC would attempt to take jurisdiction over them.

A reading of this FPC document certainly confirms the fact that Congress must specifically define the area in which the FPC may operate. My bill clearly states those limits and would by congressional mandate let the FPC and likewise the affected producers know exactly where they stand.

Assuming that the present members of the FPC understand this matter thoroughly and will seek to carry out and construe the act as Congress originally intended that they should, who can say with any certainty how long the present members of the Commission will continue to serve? Another set of Commissioners might reverse the administrative policy to which the present members subscribe and have agreed. That very thing has happened before; it might happen again.

If the present members of the Commission are agreed, as the report would seem to indicate, that the FPC under the clear intent of the Natural Gas Act is not authorized to take jurisdiction over production and gathering, then they should have no objection whatever to having the act amended so that it will be plain and unequivocal.

It occurs to me, however, that the FPC like numerous other agencies and bureaus which have been for many years interpreting the laws enacted by the Congress in such a way as to give them the broadest possible power without restraint, merely wants to head off legislative action that would curb its power.

When the Interstate case was in the fifth circuit court, the FPC had ample opportunity to acknowledge its limitations with respect to production and gathering. It turned a cold shoulder to this opportunity.

There is only one conclusion that can be reached, and that is that the FPC wanted this broad authority so that it could be in a position to take under its jurisdiction any oil or gas operator whom it wanted to. Thus far the FPC has been quite successful in having its position upheld by the courts. Hence, I raise this question: Since the law under the Interstate ruling authorizes FPC jurisdiction over the operator of every well from which gas is destined for interstate commerce, why does it not enforce the law?

The Commission is now in this position: It must either enfore the law, bring all of the operators in under its jurisdiction, or it would certainly be guilty of ignoring the law. Should it try to enforce the law as now determined by the Interstate case, certainly the Commission will be in trouble with Congress. If it ignores the law, and just selects certain particular operators it wants to bring under its jurisdiction and lets the others go, then it is guilty of discrimination.

There is only one proper answer to all of this confusion, and that is to let the Congress write into law the standards and make sure the FPC carries out the congressional mandate. That is the sole purpose that those of us who have introduced the amendments to the Natural Gas Act have in mind. The offered amendments will do just that. Confusion and uncertainty among oil and gas producers, land owners with producing gas wells on their lands, owners of royalty interests, State officials, consumers, and the gas companies, have been created by the FPC. It now asks to be trusted to cure its own mistakes and deviations from the law. Theirs is the old familiar plea of administrative agencies for all-out authority. This leads to Government by men, instead of Government by law. That is why Congress should act quickly and spell out in no uncertain terms just what authority it intends that the Commission shall have in relation to the natural-gas industry.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 19 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GRIFFITHS] a member of the committee.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds with his address, will he yield to me for the purpose of directing an inquiry either to him or to some other member of the subcommittee?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is there any restriction provided in the bill upon the use of funds from the Treasury for the procurement of silver? The gentleman from Illinois in years gone by has given a good deal of attention to the matter of silver purchases. I wonder if there is a silver-purchase fight in the offing on this bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. There is nothing in this bill?

Mr. CANFIELD. There is nothing in this bill with reference to that at all.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. As a new member of this committee who has been sitting here for the last 4 years, I have noticed that every time one of these committees came with a bill they started handing out orchids to the chairman and other members of the committee; and it made me a little shaky. It rather got under my skin. But I have had an education. I really want to add my word to this hardworking committee and our chairman, to the Members on the minority side, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. D'ALESANDRO] the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BATES]. If you worked mornings and afternoons and nights trying to keep up with them, then you will see that you have a job. There is not much on this bill that I am going to speak about.

Previous speakers have alluded to the wealth of material appearing in the printed hearings on this bill, and I would like to emphasize that they are well worth reading. They contain some great lessons in the functions and operations of our Government. Certain testimony will certainly impress the reader with the efficiency of parts of the Government. Unfortunately, a few places show waste, extravagance, and maladministration. One of these is the Coast Guard, and some of their sorry examples have been recounted by the previous speakers.

I would like to add a little to that picture. As we all know, the Coast Guard becomes a part of the Navy in time of war, and it was only a little more than a year ago that this agency returned to the Treasury Department after its naval service in World War II—a service, let it be said, that was highly creditable and a contributing factor to victory. On page 661 of the hearings you will find a high ranking officer of the Coast Guard, Captain Richmond, referring to it as "an auxiliary of the Navy." On the same page, shortly before, he had said in answer to a question by the chairman, "not being too familiar with what the Navy is doing now, I cannot answer that directly." Captain Richmond is Chief of the Planning and Control Staff of the Coast Guard, which he calls an auxiliary of the Navy, yet he is not familiar with what the Navy is doing.

The Coast Guard is maintaining three training stations, including the Coast Guard Academy at New London, Conn. At the Academy there are 345 cadets and a staff of 51. The training schools are located at Mayport, Fla., and Groton, Conn. At the present time there are 800 men at these schools, but Captain Richmond testified that the normal enrollment would be about 400. On page 659 you will find a discussion of these schools, but you will find no cogent reason why one of these schools could not be closed down. It may be true that one school is for boot training, and one is for petty officers. Is there any reason why both groups could not be trained in the same location, under one administrative set up? No such reason could be given by the Coast Guard. Certainly 800 men could be stationed at one base without overcrowding, and without lessening the amount and value of the training received.

I asked Captain Richmond what happens to these men when they finish this boot training. He stated that they come out as apprentice seamen or seamen second class, or firemen second class, and then are sent to sea or to some shore facility. There they would be advanced, and the better ones might become petty officers, through taking correspondence courses. He does not have to attend the school for petty officers at Groton. While talking of petty officers, it might be said that the Coast Guard today has 19,500 enlisted men. Twelve thousand of these are petty officers—more than one half of the total enlisted strength. Fifteen percent of the people in the Coast Guard are officers. Sixty percent of the enlisted personnel are petty officers. Surely there should be no lack of supervision for the 25 percent that are the seamen.

Getting further into the training program, I could not help but wonder why we should have two sets of schools turning out seamen: the Navy and the Coast Guard. These men man ships that are not too dissimilar. Coast Guard cutters are very much like Navy destroyers. In the war they did the same work. Coast Guard men and Navy men both manned our amphibious craft. Coast Guard men sailed many of our transports. Unification of our armed services is a much-talked-of subject these days. Duplication of effort between the Army and Navy is to be eliminated. Why not eliminate the duplicate training programs of the Navy and the Coast Guard? Why cannot all our seamen be trained in the same boot camps? Summed up into one word, Captain Richmond's answer was "jealousy" The Coast Guard is afraid the Navy would take the best men, and the Navy is afraid the Coast Guard would take the best men. The Coast Guard today does not send many men to Navy trade schools because when they do, the Navy wants them to furnish some of the instructors. This the Coast Guard will not do. So they set up their own school. It could even be in the same building as the Navy school, although it would be more in keeping with the Coast Guard administrative practices for them to buy the building next door to set up an identical school.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I yield.

Mr. BONNER. The gentleman will recall that at the beginning of the war the Coast Guard had the job of training merchant seamen for the Maritime Commission.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Yes.

Mr. BONNER. Now there is a distinct and separate training branch for merchant seamen. They could very well be taken care of by the Coast Guard under this training program in my estimation.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. That is correct.

Mr. BONNER. I wonder what the gentleman from Ohio and the Appropriations Committee will do when this additional fund is asked for an identical training program.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Does the training of the merchant marine come under the Coast Guard?

Mr. BONNER. The request will be for a separate and distinct training program similar to the Coast Guard training program.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I cannot see any reason why this whole thing should not be consolidated.

Mr. BONNER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I come now to the Post Office Department. The committee received another example of maladministration, and that in the Post Office Department's office of the Solicitor, which the chairman mentioned. In this instance, however, it is good to know that the error has been corrected, and that Mr. F. J. Delany, the new Solicitor intends to see that the duties of his office are carried out fully and carefully. One of the most important of these duties is representing the Post Office Department in mail-rate cases. The Post Office does not bargain directly with the carriers—the railroads and the air lines—as to rates for carrying mail. Such rates are fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for railroads, and the Civil Aeronautics Board for the air lines. There has been no change in railway mail rates since 1928, but just 2 weeks ago the railroads filed their first application for a change since that time, and they are now asking an increase of 45 percent. This would require about $55,000,000 a year more. The Post Office Department will be represented, and will take an active part, in the hearings which the Commission will hold on these applications. The rate that is fixed by the Commission after such hearings will be retroactive to the date the application was filed, which was last February 14. Mr. J. D. Hardy, Deputy Assistant Second Postmaster General, made the following statement to the committee, appearing on page 143 of the hearings:

> We are really at the mercy of the Interstate Commerce Commission, because whatever rate they fix, we must pay. I think we can properly anticipate a rather substantial increase.

This bill carries $145,000,000 for railway-mail and mail-messenger service. A little more than $112,000,000 of this will go to the railroads. This money will go to 250 railroad companies, and covers payments on 512 railroad routes. These railroad-mail payments are discussed on pages 194 through 200.

The Post Office Department might also be said to be at the mercy of the Civil Aeronautics Board on air-mail rates. At present, air-mail routes cover approximately 77,000 miles, covering 82 routes, serviced by 20 carriers. Charts appearing on page 234 of the hearings will show air-mail postage revenues, payments to carriers, and total air-mail expenditures. In the past 10 years, revenues have exceeded payments to carriers in 7 years, including the period 1941–46. Air-mail revenues have exceeded total air-mail expenditures for the last 3 years for which figures are available. Last year, the appropriation for domestic air mail—this entire discussion is on domestic air mail, for foreign air mail is carried in another appropriation—was $49,000,000, but the volume of mail fell far below expectations, and the expenditures amounted to only about $33,700,000. This bill carries an appropriation for the item of $37,000,000, which will permit an increase in volume, and such can be expected because the reduction in air-mail rates from 8 to 5 cents is increasing the volume.

The payments to air-mail carriers do constitute a subsidy. The Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 provides that the Board shall consider the need of the carrier for mail compensation sufficient to enable the carrier to perform the postal service, and sufficient, together with the other revenue of the carrier, to enable the carrier to carry out or effect the transportation objectives in the way they are supposed to be carried out. That is, to maintain and continue the development of air transportation in the interest of commerce, the national defense, and the postal service. It is therefore indicated that the act comtemplates that if the carrier is certificated, which would mean that the CAB has found it in the public interest for any of those three objectives, post-office funds will be paid out for mail service which will more than support just the mail part of it.

In other words, the post office, through this appropriation, is subsidizing the air lines. It is not within the province of the Appropriations Committee to change this, and while we are appropriating funds to carry the mail, we must also meet the rates charged by the CAB to subsidize the air lines. Testimony on this subject was obtained by an officer of the Civil Aeronautics Board, called before our subcommittee so that we might have the complete picture, and is found on page 209 of the hearings. Illuminating testimony on what we may expect in this field in the near future appears on page 147 of the hearings, and there you will note that when air lines run into financial difficulties, they look to the postal service to extricate them. Air lines are running into such difficulties today, and the post office may have to foot the bills.

We hope that the Solicitor, by actively representing the post office in rate and certification cases, can effect some savings. It is much to be regretted that such representation was not carried out in past years.

I have cited two examples of poor administration, and before I conclude, I feel that I should point out one case where a department itself was able to recommend a reduction of more than $1,500,000. The Third Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. J. J. Lawler, believes that he can operate his office on that much less money in 1948. It is rare that a Government official comes before a congressional committee and says, "I spent almost $13,000,000 last year, but next year I think I can get along on a little more than $11,000,000." If more Government officials followed the example of Mr. Lawler, the work of the Appropriations Committee would be much more pleasant, and good government would be better served.

The Third Assistant Postmaster General is the fiscal officer of the Post Office. Under his jurisdiction comes the vast Postal Savings System, which has over $3,000,000,000 on deposit, most of it invested in Treasury bonds. There is no appropriation in this bill for this system, except indirectly in that some clerical work is required in the administrative offices. The Postal Savings System is a bank and pays its own way. Its profits in 1945 were about $14,000,000.

The Third Assistant is also charged with the manufacture and distribution of stamps and stamped paper, and $7,400,000 of the $10,300,000 appropriated in this bill for his office goes for this purpose. About 18,000,000,000 stamps, 2,500,000,000 stamped post cards, and 2,100,000,000 stamped envelopes will be issued in 1948. For those who are interested in stamp collecting, I would suggest reading pages 255–259 of the hearings. The expense to the Post Office Department of running the Philatelic Agency in the Post Office in 1948 will be about $217,000, and the receipts are expected to exceed $3,000,000.

This Bureau of the Post Office Department also must pay out money on money orders more than one year old, for which $600,000 is carried in this bill. This is another item where Mr. Lawler suggested a savings, even going so far as to tell the committee that the decline in redemptions had been so great since the original estimates were prepared that a sizeable reduction could be made in the estimates. Money orders were used as currency and savings during the war, particularly by troops abroad, and the decline in this activity permits the contemplated savings.

The other item completing the Third Assistant's appropriations is indemnities for loss of registered mails, and this will call for $2,300,000 in fiscal 1948.

I may say that with the possible exception of two witnesses we had before us, every single, solitary man wanted to do the very best job he could whether in the Treasury Department or in the Post Office Department. I believe Mr. Hannegan would rather go down in memory as the greatest Postmaster General than as the greatest chairman of a political party.

But, you know, somehow or other you cannot get quite to the root of it, and if this Congress could work out some scheme to lay before those bureaus and say that within 6 months from now they must come up here with specific recommendations, and then make them follow that policy, then I think we will have a better chance of balancing the budget.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman quoted the record on page 147, to show that the postal revenues for airmail were $81,237,389, and that the expenses were $49,937,041, showing excess revenues over expenses of $31,300,000. Does the gentleman call that $31,300,000 excess of revenues over expenses a subsidy?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I call it that in this way: According to the law, if you get a certificate to run an airline, we will say, between points A and B, and you lose money, you can go to the Post Office Department, and they will pay your deficit.

Mr. HINSHAW. I was asking about this $31,300,000. Some people seem to have the idea that that is a subsidy to the airlines. Actually it is a profit to the Government, is it not, over what they pay the airlines, for the carrying of the mail?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. What they receive over what they pay may be a profit, but in certain cases they have had to go beyond and pay for more than they carried.

Mr. HINSHAW. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I am a member, voted out a bill from the committee a couple or three years ago, that did not reach the floor, which indicated quite clearly that in the interest of national defense it was advisable to operate certain routes not at a profit, and I am speaking now of mail profit. Those routes were operated with a very small mail load for the purpose, I suppose, of giving a reason to install certain navigational aids, landing fields, and so forth, used and useful in the national defense and, likewise, have served national defense in days past. Now that, we recognize, is not a profitable business for the Government. On the other hand, no one yet has made any comparison of the actual value of the service performed in carrying the mail by the air lines to the cost of doing that service that the air lines undertake. Now, the value of the carriage of the mail should have some reference ordinarily to the cost of doing business, should it not?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I will say to the gentleman from California, yes, insofar as I really believe in it. Possibly there may be some other way, because we must have the air routes and our air transportation, but I am quite sure that we should hold the Post Office Department responsible for the deficit that that might result in.

Mr. HINSHAW. Of course, the Post Office Department was the department of Government that really instituted the air-mail system and called upon the public to provide that service, and they continued to call upon the public to provide air-mail service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, during the general debate upon this pending measure, H. R. 2436, it is my desire to commend the Appropriations Committee, and the subcommittee which has handled this measure, for the sound and constructive reductions that have been made in this bill. The very fact that a decrease of $897,072,750 is made below the 1948 estimates will be heartening to the people of this country. These appropriations have been mounting higher and higher for a long time, and I feel confident that this reduction, made in this measure, will be reassuring to the people, that we have started in the right direction—in the direction of economy in our Government.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the appropriations heretofore made have been in such staggering amounts and they made possible the addition of many, many more Government employees, thereby increasing the pay roll in the departments here involved, has caused the people—the taxpayers of the country—to abandon all hope that their own Government would, at any time, make a firm resolve, and keep it, to reduce the Federal spending. Therefore this measure which is now presented will be hailed with acclaim by the people of the Nation as the first step taken in the right direction—and that direction is toward the reduction of the Federal spending of the taxpayers' money. I mention this fact because the people have watched the mounting appropriations, in the many and various departments of Government, until they were appalled by that apparently reckless abandon on the part of the majority which were in power before January 3, 1947. Now the change has occurred—and we find that this particular appropriation is reduced, and the House of Representatives has taken this step to assure that there will be a reduction in the fund allowed for spending and also that the needless and useless employees in those departments will have to go. This has a wholesome effect throughout our Nation, because the people are bowed down under the burden of taxes, and this reduction—together with many other reductions that will surely follow—will reassure the people that the tax burden will be readjusted and that their burden of taxation will be relieved insofar as possible.

Mr. Chairman, may I subscribe wholeheartedly to this necessary change in the policy of our Government, at this time. We are faced, on every hand, with demands for aid. Europe waits for our money with open hands, for almost every claimed emergency. In many instances we have been gullible, and very generous—responding to almost every demand. The end of that road has been reached, and now we must look, to some extent, to our own country and to our own needs, and the greatest factor that we can possess is the fact that we have made our own Nation both sound and strong. That can be accomplished in but one way, and that one way is by the building and development of a strong nation financially—one which can cope with any and every emergency. A weak nation—or any nation which is overburdened with debt—or a nation which has no reserve in the hands of its people—faces a crisis if and when she meets an emergency. While we do not contemplate any emergency, yet we must prepare to meet the future, and that can be best accomplished when we are sound and strong as a nation. It is my hope that those in charge of all future appropriations will guard the Treasury of the United States, and by so doing they will guard the people—the taxpayers—of this Nation. That the reserve left in the hands of the people will aid in the development of the progress in our Nation, and such a policy will revive the ambition to go forward in the arts and trades in civil life during the postwar period, all of which will aid civilization generally in the march of progress as we desire to witness it.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I merely rise to commend all those who have participated in this very deep cut in this appropriation bill. Our Government must get along without spending all of the resources in our Nation in time of peace, and the needless and unnecessary employees now upon the pay roll must go. That is the wish and the will of the people, and that is the wish and will of a majority of the Representatives of the people serving them in the National Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the efficiency of an artisan is determined largely by the excellence of his tools and the success of an executive depends to a great extent upon the competence of his staff. The Committee on Appropriations is no exception to the rule. We have had a staff of exceptional qualification and ability which has cooperated to produce the greatest volume and quality of work. So it is a matter of deep regret to us today that we lose, with the final disposition of this bill, one of the highest-ranking members of that staff, Jack McFall, who appears here on the floor with the committee for the last time.

Mr. McFall has been in the service on the Hill for almost a quarter of a century. He has been with the Committee on Appropriations for something like 19 or 20 years. His work with the committee was interrupted during the war, of course, by his naval service abroad. He went across as a naval lieutenant and came back as a naval commander with a record for creditable and distinguished service. He resumed his place with us and has been with us since that time but leaves us this month to enter the diplomatic service, for which he is particularly qualified.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. I think the distinguished former chairman of the committee will agree with me when I say that Jack McFall not only looks the part of a diplomat but acts the part.

Mr. CANNON. That is self-evident. I am glad to find myself in complete agreement with our chairman on this as well as on many other matters under discussion this afternoon. And may I take advantage of the opportunity to felicitate the chairman on the admirable way in which he has handled the hearings on the bill and his very effective presentation of the bill both in the committee and in the House. I have no doubt that he, like the rest of us, has considered himself fortunate in having the benefit of Jack McFall's counsel and advice on many of the intricate problems carried in the bill. We regret to see him go. We have offered every inducement to keep him. We have offered him the highest salary ever paid any man on the staff, up to the beginning of this Congress. But his heart is in the diplomatic service, and the tact, diplomacy, and capacity which have characterized his work for the committee will stand him in good stead in his new field. So, reluctantly and regretfully, we have consented to let him go, although this is a most inopportune time for us to dispense with his services. I am certain not only the committee but the House join with me in wishing him Godspeed and good luck and the continued success I am certain he will have.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is notable in another respect. Never before has an annual supply bill been reported to the Congress so late in the session. Here we are approaching the ides of March, and this is the first of the annual bills called up in the House for consideration. In the history of the Republic, since the administration of President Washington, never before has the first major appropriation bill been reported so late in the session. By this time last year we had considered and passed four of the annual appropriation bills, the independent offices bill, the agricultural bill, the civil functions of the War Department bill, and the Treasury and Post Office bill. Of course, for many years we brought in and passed all appropriation bills before the constitutional date of March 4. I appreciate the fact that there has been delay incident to the organization of the committees. But we have had notice since November 5 of the situation and, in any event, the delay is without precedent.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is extraordinary in another respect. It is the first and the most significant indication as to the intention of the leadership of the House and the Congress to carry out the great and laudable program of efficiency, retrenchment, and economy which was so strongly emphasized in the campaign last November.

It is immaterial, my friends, whether the sum named in the resolution reported out by the Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget is $6,000,000,000 or $4,500,000,000. The cut eventually proposed in the resolution, and agreed to by the two Houses, means nothing unless corresponding and proportional amounts are cut from the supply bills as they are presented to the House. For some months now the attention of the country has been centered on the overall cut to be made in congressional appropriations and in recent weeks the report of this bill has been eagerly anticipated. Every statement emanating from the leadership of the House indicated vast reductions in amounts and wholesale dismissals of personnel. We waited with bated breath. And here, at last, is the long publicized bill. Here we have the first opportunity to judge the sincerity of these protestations of economy and retrenchment. Here is the first installment of the $6,000,000,000 reduction and the million and a half separations from the Federal pay roll.

What does it propose? Why, Mr. Chairman, it is unbelievable. Instead of the huge cuts we have been led to expect, this bill actually cuts the budget less than we cut it in the last session—when we were still on the way back to a peacetime status.

Here is the largest appropriation bill of the session. It comprises in round figures, practically a third of the budget. If we ever propose to make a reduction in the expenses and pay rolls of the Government here is the place to make it. If they cannot cut any part of $6,000,000,000 out of a third of the budget, how can they cut $6,000,000,000 out of the remaining two-thirds of the budget?

As has been said, this bill cuts the estimates for the Post Office Department only $14,000,000. Why, we cut the Post Office budget last year $19,000,000. And that was not the most significant feature of it. They are cutting the $14,000,000 this year from a budget which exceeds $1,500,000,000. Last year we cut $19,000,000 from a budget of only $1,200,000,000.

My good friend, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, says: "Well, last year we had some deficiencies."

In view of that statement, the question naturally arises as to whether further appropriations are contemplated if this bill fails to provide for the Department to the end of the fiscal year? Is a choice to be made between a deficiency appropriation and discontinuation of service? That is the alternative. Will more money be provided or will delivery of the mail be stopped?

But let us not lose sight of the primary issue. Our objective here is to deliver the first installment of the promised six billion cut in the budget, and the first contingent of the million—some promised a million and a half—dismissals from the swollen Federal pay rolls. Where are they? Where are the billions of cuts and the million of dismissals—or any part of them.

You cannot point out a single dismissal in the entire Post Office Department.

If the first and largest appropriation bill to be reported to the House is to be taken as a fair sample of the redemption of these campaign pledges of retrenchment, the country is headed for a sad disillusionment by the time the last bill of the session is reached.

My friends, I am distressed and disappointed. I had hoped to cooperate with the House leadership in real economies—in the liquidation of all wartime expenditures and the reduction of the budget to a peacetime basis. I deplore and deprecate the reckless and profligate extravagance of these spenders who now refuse to cut the budget on a $1,500,000,000 estimate as much as we cut it last year on a $1,200,000,000 estimate.

Mr. GORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Do I understand that in this bill which provides for 490,000 bureaucrats in the Post Office Department not one bureaucrat is cut off?

Mr. CANNON. Not one single bureaucrat. Not a single Communist. Not a single boondoggler. Of all the teeming hordes of parasites and chiselers and loafers and fan dancers and subversives we were told last November were infesting the Departments of the Government, not a single one is being separated from his soft job in the entire Post Office Department. Every one of them is being retained by this bill—at the largest salaries ever paid in the history of the Government.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. In just a moment. If the gentleman will permit me to conclude my statement. Even such purported economies as are reported in the bill are not economies at all. For example the $800,000,000 in tax refunds they propose to "save" here cannot be construed as a saving by any stretch of the imagination. Let anyone show us where it will save a penny.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman is a member of the Appropriations Committee and I believe the senior member of the minority. I presume the gentleman sat in the hearings at the time the subcommittee made its report. Did the gentleman make any effort in the committee to reduce any of the bureaucrats he is speaking of? Where can these cuts be made?

Mr. CANNON. My friend is certainly aware that I was completely overshadowed by the overwhelming majority which completely controlled the committee. I regret to say that under the circumstances I was merely a bystander standing by, an onlooker looking on. I was for the economy program. I was for retrenchment. I was for reduction. I have repeatedly said on this floor that I favor reducing the budget more than $6,000,000,000. That is not an idle statement. It is borne out by our record in the last Congress, in which we not only excised $64,000,000,000, but cut the estimate on this identical appropriation $19,000,000 whereas this year you propose to cut it only $14,000,000.

You say you are saving $800,000,000 on tax refunds. You are not saving a thin dime. Every penny of it must be paid. Nobody denies that. It is the law. If a man overpays us on taxes, we must return the surplus. We have no alternative. So, your proposal here is merely to defer the inevitable day of settlement.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. I think the only reason that was put in the report is because it is a big figure, even if it does not mean anything.

Mr. CANNON. Exactly. Let us examine it a little more closely. They say the amount required for the purpose was overestimated.

If in the past this item had, from year to year, been overestimated, such a charge might be plausible. But what is the history of the estimate? Last year the Department, in estimating the money required for this item, underestimated it. The year before, in estimating money for the item, they also underestimated it. For every year from the beginning they have consistently underestimated it. I was told by representatives of the Treasury Department, when they came up here the other day to testify before the committee, that, in their opinion, they had again underestimated it.

Who is entitled to credence in such matters, departmental officials who have had many years of experience in the administration of the law—and who have consistently underestimated it—or Members of the House who have taken a cursory glance at it and claim it has been overestimated? Permit me to refer to the opinion of an impartial commentator on that point. I read from an editorial in this morning's Washington Post——

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Just as soon as I read this brief paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I read from an editorial in this morning's issue of the Washington Post:

> The amount of overpayments next year is at best only an informed guess. But we are disposed to place more reliance on the guesses of Government experts than on the opinions of the House Appropriations Committee. In any event, a mere cutting of the estimates of prospective refunds will not save money. It will simply necessitate passing a deficiency bill if the lower estimates prove inadequate and probably delay restitution to taxpayers. Hence, we conclude that Democratic charges of "budget legerdemain" are well warranted.

This is a fair sample of the opinion of the public and the press. Up to this time no editorial comment has been received taking issue with this point of view.

The postponement of the day of accounting is not an economy. It will not effect a saving of money or result in any other advantage to the Treasury or the taxpayer.

On the contrary it will result in serious disadvantages. The delay in making the appropriation will not only disorganize the very satisfactory system in use for many years but it may delay the payment of money due taxpayers who are entitled to a refund. Conceivably the amount provided in the bill may not be sufficient to take care of payments until a deficiency bill can be passed. It might not only discommode the taxpayer but it would involve a heavy expense to the Government in interest charges. Amounts overdue draw interest at the rate of 6 percent. If, as the Washington Post suggests, the Treasury's estimate should prove correct and there should be a consequent delay of but three months in providing for the deficit, the provision in the bill would add to—not take away from—the budget, $12,000,000, and $4,000,000 more per month for each additional month of delay.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to my colleague from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Does the gentleman mean to tell this Committee today that if we do not pay the refunds that are found to be due that we are going to have to pay these men back interest on it?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; interest at the very substantial rate of 6 percent.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Six percent? Is that economy?

Mr. CANNON. That is the brand of economy carried in this paragraph of the bill.

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COUDERT. The distinguished former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has heavily belabored the point of the estimate on refunds. Does the gentleman contend that the Appropriations Committee is not within its legitimate and proper right in making such estimate for itself and substituting its own estimate for the Bureau of the Budget's estimate? Or would the distinguished gentleman from Missouri have the Appropriations Committee as a matter of principle and without further consideration merely accept the estimate of the Budget Bureau even if in its own best judgment they disagreed with it?

Mr. CANNON. They should accept the estimate unless they have evidence on which to base a contrary opinion. No such evidence appears in the hearings.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I am glad to yield to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. CANFIELD. Does the former chairman of this committee contend here and now that the Treasury made this estimate on tax refunds?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; this estimate was made by the Treasury Department. It has been made by the Department for many years.

Mr. CANFIELD. I beg to disagree with the gentleman. The estimate was made by the Bureau of the Budget, not by the Treasury Department.

Mr. CANNON. The system under which the estimate was made has been in effect——

Mr. CANFIELD. The estimate was made by the Bureau of the Budget, not the Treasury Department.

Mr. CANNON. The Treasury Department made the estimate and transmitted it to the Bureau of the Budget. All departmental estimates are submitted through the Budget Bureau. But that is beside the point. The question is not what governmental agency made the estimate but whether the estimate is accurate.

And the prime consideration is not who made the estimate but whether eliminating the appropriation in this bill will save money. The report does not claim that this postponement of funds for tax refunds will result in the slightest saving. No one in the entire debate here on the floor today has contended that it will save a penny.

And in the meantime while the committee is shadow-boxing this $800,000,000 item out of the ring to await the next bout—in which it is certain to register a knockout against the committee's claims of economy—the committee is failing to make even a modicum of the cut which would have to be made in this bill in order to contribute its part to the proposed cut of $6,000,000,000 in the budget and a million and a half reduction in departmental personnel.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for whatever legislative budget is finally reported out of conference, not with any idea of committing myself to the ceilings ultimately determined upon, but because an affirmative vote is an evidence of intent and purpose to retrench to the minimum, and because retrenchment is in keeping with the consistent and collective policy we have followed on this side of the aisle through the last several sessions of Congress; not arbitrary cuts unsupported by evidence; not cuts in the nature of deferments, made to establish an economy record for political advantage, but cuts in the public interest which will result in lasting lessened demands on the public purse.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to an item in this bill, found on page 23 commencing with line 18 and running through to line 12 on page 24, having to do with ceilings on the price of typewriters bought by the Federal Government. I have the highest regard for the membership of this committee and for my colleagues in the House and I feel very sure that if they had had the time to devote to looking into this particular detail that they perhaps would like to have had, this language would not be found in the bill. If I fail in the 10 minutes available to me this afternoon to convince them that they should join with me in a move to strike this language from the bill, I can only conclude that I have not properly presented the matter to them and to other members of this committee.

I appeal this afternoon to the fairness of my colleagues. This matter of setting a price ceiling on typewriters bought by the Federal Government is an old custom established by the Appropriations Committee first in 1913. I am advised that it would be possible to make a point of order and have this language stricken from the bill due to the fact that it extends the limitation not only to this bill but to any other act; however, I would rather present the matter on its merits and hope the committee will decide not to continue this unfair practice which in the next year or two may prove detrimental to some departments of the Government. Testimony will be found in the hearings on pages 866 to 876 indicating quite clearly that the manufacturers of typewriters want to be fair in their dealings with the Government. Different proposals were made. In substance they all were agreed that they wanted to sell typewriters to the Federal Government at as low a price as they would sell to any other large users of typewriters. In fact, some said they would sell typewriters at a lower price to the Government than to other purchasers of typewriters.

This ceiling of $77 was set last year. In 1922 the ceiling was set at $70. I believe in the last Congress they were given a 10 percent increase. A standard typewriter—Royal, Underwood, or L. C. Smith—sold in 1941 for $115.50. That same typewriter today is selling for $142.50. Still there is no increase provided for in this bill. Every time I have brought this to the attention of the subcommittee, and I have brought it to the attention of the subcommittee on several occasions since 1939, I have been told it is a complex problem, they do not know exactly what the cost of typewriters are, but they say we are going to look into the matter and next year we will deal with it on the basis of our information. Someone may contend today or tomorrow that the thing to do is to leave this in the bill, then look into the price question later. In all sincerity I submit that the fairest thing to do is to take the limitation out of the bill. Let the Government purchase typewriters as they purchase everything else. Then in the year to come, if they can give some justification for this limitation, put it back in next year. If they bring in a justification, I certainly will join in restoring the ceilings.

Is there any more reason why the Government should purchase typewriters by putting a ceiling in an appropriation bill than it should say: "Well, a Ford automobile is selling for $1,200. It ought to be sold to the Government for $700. We will put that limitation in the bill." There would be just as much reason for that. No Member of this House can stand up here on the floor today and tell us what it costs to manufacture these various brands of typewriters.

There is not a monopoly on typewriters. There are 8 or 10 companies manufacturing them. No one company is big enough to fill the needs of the Federal Government. According to the hearings, the Government will purchase from 40,000 to 50,000 typewriters in the next year.

What has happened because of this limitation? One company, the Royal Typewriter Co., the home office of which is in my district, reluctantly advised the Government that they can no longer supply typewriters at this ceiling price. The L. C. Smith-Corona Co. said, "We can only stand selling 500 typewriters to the Government at that price." The Underwood Corp. says, "We can let you have 5,000 at that price." They are selling these typewriters to the Government under the limitations of this act definitely at a loss. That loss is being made up and must be made up if they are going to finish the year in black ink, by putting that loss on the business community or others who buy typewriters.

I want to call the committee's attention particularly and urge that between now and tomorrow afternoon you read a few of the short statements that appear in the RECORD, the first one being on page 870.

On page 868 you will find a letter addressed to the Honorable LOUIS LUDLOW, signed by the vice president of the Royal Typewriter Co., which gives you the historical background of this matter.

On page 870 there is testimony of the vice president of the Remington-Rand Co. dealing with this subject. He suggests that instead of this limitation, if there must be some limitation put in, that this language be proposed:

> No part of any money appropriated by this or any other Act shall be used during the fiscal year 1948 for the purchase within the continental limits of the United States of any typewriting machines at a price in excess of that currently charged by the manufacturer for such machines when sold to users of such machines in large quantities.

Bear in mind that there is no limitation written into the law for the purchase of adding machines, calculators, or even electric typewriters. There is a ceiling on noiseless typewriters, and one of the reasons that every office on the Hill cannot have a noiseless typewriter is that the companies simply cannot sell them at the ceiling. An Underwood noiseless sells in the market at $204. In this bill there is a ceiling of $88, which is less than the cost of production of an Underwood noiseless typewriter.

I think that must be apparent to every Member of the House, bearing in mind simply the increases in wages and materials in the typewriter industry that have gone into effect since 1939 alone. The Department surely does not make out a case to justify this limitation or this ceiling, although the Treasury Department does ask that it be continued.

On page 875 Mr. LEFEVRE inserts a statement in the RECORD in which he suggests:

> In determining what discount should apply to Government sales it would be desirable to require each company to submit data that would aid in reaching an equitable figure. Such data might include their present rates of discount to commercial users and schools, what advertising and sales expense they allocate to Government sales, what savings in distribution costs are involved in Government sales and whether such costs of sales to the Government are susceptible of reduction.

If that is going to be the policy of the Government, why not do it on everything? Why not say we will cut the cost of toll calls; they are too high, so we will put a limit in our appropriation bill and say we won't pay more than 50 percent of the advertised toll price? We do not do it on any other commodity, and it is an important item to those companies. In 1932 the Federal Government spent $400,000 to purchase typewriters that year. In 1941 the Royal Typewriter Co. alone sold $8,500,000 worth of typewriters to the Federal Government. That is important to those who work in the Royal Typewriter plant and to the company itself.

I am sure that this ceiling can be taken off without causing any inconvenience or any unnecessary increase in the price. As was said on one occasion when this matter was before the Congress, "We are simply legalizing a trust in the typewriter industry; we are making them do something that is unlawful for them to do." They could not act together themselves and agree at a price at which they will sell typewriters and we, by law, make them sell them at a predetermined price.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. I believe there is a law establishing ceiling prices on automobiles purchased by the Federal Government. Notwithstanding that fact, the committee indulged in many of the facts presented by the gentleman from Connecticut this afternoon. We know how deeply concerned he has been over this problem for many years. At the same time he must appreciate this fact: This language came to us from the Bureau of the Budget. The language has been in the appropriation bill for some 20 years. We, of the committee, did not feel that we were equipped, and did not have the information, to pass properly on the request of the companies at this time, so we have ordered our investigating staff to go into all phases of this situation so that when the 1949 bill comes before us we will be able to do something and take proper action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. In reply may I say this, that I can show you in the RECORD of previous debates on this bill the very same promise, that it will be looked into the next year.

Mr. CANFIELD. I must disagree with my friend and colleague from Connecticut. This is the first time we have had investigators associated with the Appropriations Committee that could be called on to do a job, and they are on the job now.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Is there any reason why the Congress should determine the price at which the Government shall buy typewriters any more than any other commodity the Government buys? Why pick this particular item?

Mr. CANFIELD. My only answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Connecticut is that the Treasury insists that there are reasons. Personally I am inclined to be sympathetic to the proposition advanced by the gentleman from Connecticut this afternoon, and I am going to try to help him and others pursuing this problem and do something about it.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I appreciate that. I know the gentleman will find out. Certainly they have not made a case in this hearing to justify ceilings.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DURHAM. May I say to the gentleman that neither the Committee on Appropriations nor anyone else wants to set up an OPA. I am glad the gentleman brought this up here. I think it is time we should consider the matter. Are we going to continue an OPA by an appropriations act? I think it is very unwise.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. The Appropriations Committee is not as generous as the OPA. OPA gave them a 14-percent increase in their ceiling price a few months before it went out of existence. We are holding them to 10 percent above the 1922 price.

Mr. DURHAM. I meant to agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I know the gentleman does.

With all due respect to the committee, and it will be no reflection on the committee, I do feel compelled to offer tomorrow an amendment to strike this language from the bill and submit it to the judgment of the House. I say this with all due respect to my colleagues and with deep appreciation of the assurances of the chairman of the subcommittee that this subject will be further investigated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, the matter of bringing about economy in any department of the Government finally gets down to the very difficult details involved in the carrying on of that department. It seems to me that this subcommittee have applied themselves very diligently to that task. The facts I am about to present to them probably should have been presented to this subcommittee at an earlier date, but it was impossible for me to do that because shortly after this information came to me it was necessary for me to be gone from the city of Washington. I mention it because it may have some value for the committee that appropriates for the Government Printing Office, as well as the legislative committee, in reference to these matters.

I have a letter here from the publisher of a newspaper in my district in reference to some printing being done by the Government. This printing is ordered through the local post office. This publisher writes me as follows:

> A customer of ours desired the stamped window envelopes for use in his bookkeeping department to send out statements. Since he was one of our regular customers and desired us to do all his printing, he asked us to secure the envelopes and print them up for him, with his name in the accustomed style, in a corner card.

Then this publisher goes on and tells of the prices quoted by the post office:

> We found that the charge would be $33 per thousand, for these printed prestamped window envelopes. Now the value of the stamps would be $30, which means that they would charge $3 for the window envelopes and for printing them. It so happens that we are large buyers of window envelopes, buying in quantities of not less than 50,000, and the cost to us is $2.60 a thousand for window envelopes; which means that Uncle Sam is in competition with us for printing envelopes for 40 cents a thousand. Now if the Government can make money printing envelopes at 40 cents a thousand, they run some plant, some place, more efficiently than most Government businesses are operating. Maybe that kind of business is contributing somewhat to this deficit which we are reading about, besides beating some people out of a certain amount of business.

Mr. Chairman, why should the Government of the United States do printing at a loss? It but adds to the burdens of the taxpayers. Why should the Government compete with our hometown newspapers? The newspapers are essential to our American system, they are unselfish public servants and such Government competition is unwarranted.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER].

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to speak on this particular matter tomorrow, but inasmuch as there is the opportunity to address the Committee at the present time I have made a note of some figures which I would like to call to the attention of the Committee.

The chairman of the subcommittee in his opening remarks referred to the combining of the functions of three different subdivisions into one subdivision of the General Counsel's Office. Those divisions were Tax Research, Tax Legislative Counsel, and Division of Research and Statistics, all of which would go into the General Counsel's Office. From the report, Mr. Chairman, I notice that the appropriation for Tax Research in 1947 was $175,000. That is cut out entirely. The appropriation for the Tax Legislation Counsel is $89,000, and that is cut out entirely. The Division of Research and Statistics appropriation for 1947 was $165,000, making a total of $429,000 which is entirely eliminated from this year's appropriation recommended in this bill. I would like to know from the subcommittee as to whether or not it was the intention of the subcommittee to eliminate the services of those three divisions from which every cent has been taken away in this bill.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I think I can allay his fears immediately. We allowed the General Counsel $250,000 in addition to his regular allowance to take care of these units under his jurisdiction. That is a quarter of a million dollars in addition.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Is that set out any place in the bill?

Mr. CANFIELD. Oh, yes; in the report on page 6.

Mr. EBERHARTER. It does not say specifically that it is not intended that these agencies are to be abolished. It does not say, "So much of the funds shall be used by these three divisions." I call attention to the fact that the Tax Legislative Counsel has been in operation since at least 1922. That Division is composed not completely of lawyers, but it is composed of economists, actuaries, and statisticians. Their functions have nothing whatsoever to do with the General Counsel's functions. I am just afraid the committee did not go into this subject sufficiently to justify eliminating these figures.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. If the gentleman will read the hearings between tonight and tomorrow noon, I venture to say he will agree with us that the job can be done. All I ask is that the gentleman read the hearings on these separate units and then review our incorporation of them in the Office of General Counsel. I know something of the gentleman's fairness, and I believe the gentleman will agree with us that the job can be done. Here, of all places in this bill, is where a saving can be made and should be made. I am sure of that.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I am glad to have the gentleman's assurance. I just wanted to know that it was not the purpose of the subcommittee or the general committee or the Congress that the money heretofore appropriated for these three divisions will be wiped out; that it is intended that they should function. I understand the Commissioner of Internal Revenue said he had never used the Tax Legislative Counsel. That is a position that is composed almost entirely of economists, statisticians, and actuaries. The General Counsel's Office was never called upon to furnish the information that that Tax Legislative Counsel furnished the Congress. It is only because they were in a position to furnish the Congress with the particular information they needed with respect to the formulation of proper tax bills that we have been able to get the kind of revenue we have been getting.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER] has expired.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue said he got more and better information from his own legal service than he got from any other department; he never consulted those divisions.

Mr. EBERHARTER. That is the point I make, exactly. The very word "legislative" means that it was set up for the purpose of furnishing Congress with information. So why combine it with the General Counsel's Office, that knows nothing of its responsibilities or duties.

Mr. CANFIELD. That is a part of the General Counsel's duties, to do just that same thing. If you will read the testimony of the General Counsel and the testimony of Mr. Surrey and Mr. Shere I cannot help but feel that the gentleman will agree with the committee.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I wish we could get together so that there is a clear understanding that these divisions are not to be abolished. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I take this time to inquire for my own information, and I think the information of many people who are interested in the subject, as to just exactly what the set-up is going to be under this appropriation bill of the Coast Guard and its activity, which they presently call their lifeboat stations, but which at one time was called their lifesaving service.

May I say at the outset that it is not my intention to comment one way or the other on whether or not the committee has granted to the Coast Guard a sufficient amount of money. I intend to support this committee as I intend to support all of the appropriation subcommittees in their most difficult task of cutting down our Federal expenditures.

I trust they will cut all appropriations to the absolute minimum. I will be with them a hundred percent in that endeavor. The only thing I take this time for is to find out just what the situation of this particular activity is going to be in order that the people concerned may know what is going to take place. I will tell you one reason why this is of particular concern to me. The district I represent has at least 200 miles of bay and lake coast line. We have there at the present time four lifesaving stations or lifeboat stations that have been maintained, and maintained historically, by the Coast Guard to give protection to pleasure and commercial shipping that may be in distress in those waters. Last June we had a very severe accident in which four people were drowned. It developed that the Coast Guard facilities were practically nonexistent. They had the facilities there but they were undermanned and they could not respond. In other words, by the very fact that these stations were there the people were lulled into a false sense of security. If it is going to be the case this year that these stations are not going to be properly maintained we want to know about it so that, if necessary, these people can take adequate steps for protection to insure safety to pleasure and other craft using these waters. As is generally true of most agencies when something like that happens and they are unable to give the service that is expected of them, they blame it on Congress and say: "Well, we did not have enough funds."

Let me call your attention to a letter I received when I investigated the matter. This is a letter from Admiral Farley, of the Coast Guard. He says he is deeply concerned about the personnel situation of the service, but he says that due to rapid demobilization and resultant deployment, plus the increased demands of other Coast Guard activities and insufficient funds to provide the necessary number of personnel to fulfill the requirements of the Coast Guard, a serious personnel shortage developed. That is the reason.

Now, have we given them enough money?

You will recall that last year after the Appropriations Committee made an appropriation to the Treasury Department, including Coast Guard facilities, the Coast Guard came back and said they had to have a supplemental appropriation for the lifeboat stations. I am inclined to think that what the Coast Guard has been doing is to reallocate their funds to probably more romantic and newer fields of activity rather than to the historical obligations they should maintain. They should maintain these lifesaving stations under the highest priority.

I want to know if the committee can tell me whether the bill this year will carry sufficient funds in order that these lifesaving stations can be maintained?

Mr. CANFIELD. I salute the gentleman from Wisconsin on the stand he has taken. He talks as though he were a member of the subcommittee handling this bill, because what we are doing here, as I said earlier in the afternoon, is to get the Coast Guard back home to take care of all those facilities the gentleman has mentioned this afternoon. We have provided in this bill sufficient moneys for them to do all of that work. We have also given them a great deal of elasticity in the handling of these moneys. If the Coast Guard keeps faith with the Congress appropriating funds in this bill there will be no difficulty about manning the stations the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I thank the chairman of the subcommittee and thank him for his assurances. I appreciate the position that he and his committee has taken on this matter. I also applaud the action taken by the committee in its report in saying that they have assigned to the Coast Guard itself the task of assigning priorities to its various projects. But I was wondering whether the committee had pointed any finger at the lifesaving service? I believe this may be necessary, because I am inclined to think, from their past activities, that that is not one of the activities they would like to give priority to. They seem to be more intrigued by some of their newer activities. I think some positive direction should be given them that these lifesaving activities should be given priority recognition. I am very pleased to have the assurance of the chairman of the subcommittee that he is confident that the Coast Guard, if it keeps faith with the Congress, can and will give proper recognition to its duty to properly maintain the lifeboat stations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this time of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations for the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department to have a discussion, if I may, on certain important matters in relation to aviation, which is under the legislative jurisdiction of my committee. In the first place, it is noted from the hearings that the heavy mail carriers by air receive a mail pay of about 45 cents per ton-mile and that the light carriers receive about 60 cents per ton-mile. If you recognize that a ton is the equivalent of 10 passengers, allowing 160 pounds per person of body weight and 40 pounds of baggage, you can see that by dividing the 45 cents per ton-mile by 10 you come to 4½ cents per passenger-mile, which is equivalent to the 45 cents per ton-mile rail rate. That means that the passenger and the mail both are paying approximately the same rate for their transportation.

Mail, as you know, has a priority over the passenger. You will remember that during the war when travel was exceedingly heavy if the mail exceeded the capacity of the mail compartment in an aircraft, the passengers had to give up their seats and the mail was placed in the seats of the passengers and strapped down. In other words, the mail goes through first regardless of the convenience of the traveling public. I say that to you because it must be realized that while mail has a priority the rate paid for its transportation is on a par with the rate paid by the passenger. There are other factors to be considered, of course. But the controlling factor in nearly every case is the value of the transportation. There is very little, if any, subsidy in the air-line mail pay.

My committee has recognized the need for the extension in certain areas of certain air routes. We recognize that those routes are not economical, either from the standpoint of the carriage of passengers or of mail; however, it is highly desirable that those routes be covered by aircraft for the establishment of the route; first, so that it may be available to the purposes of national defense, and, incidentally, for the service of whatever people may be at the other end of the route or on the route. It is not anticipated that those routes necessarily will be commercially profitable, although it would be hoped that in due course they would become profitable. So we are not particularly concerned when you speak of the subsidization of certain air-mail routes.

Unfortunately, the subject of air commerce comes under the purview of at least four committees of the House. There is this Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Post Office Department and Treasury; there is the Subcommittee on State, Commerce, and Justice, which has to do with the Civil Aeronautics Administration and the Civil Aeronautics Board; and I believe also that the Independent Offices Subcommittee has something to do with it some place, I cannot just remember where. On the legislative side we have the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I am a member, having jurisdiction over legislative matters relating to aviation. Then there is the Civil Service Committee that I believe now has incorporated within it the old Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which committee establishes postal rates for the dispatch of the mail, the rates to the public.

I suggest to the committee and to the House that we might very well go into a very careful look-see of this whole proposition from all angles, considering cost of the carriage of mail in various conveyances, and so forth. The gentlemen on this committee will recognize, I believe that, in the transportation of first-class mail by rail, there may be cars that are sent out on railroads to distant points, sometimes at the ends of spur lines, with very little mail in them; yet the cost of the car is charged to the Post Office Department. That, of course, is in the nature of a subsidy, if that is what you want to call it, but actually it is the cost of a service to the people. The same thing can be said to be true of mail shipments by marine vessels. We have marine vessels leaving the ports of the United States for distant parts of the world carrying a relatively small amount of mail for which very high per-ton-mile payment is made. That likewise is a subsidy. It is a subsidy on a much larger order than is given to any air line that I know of. There are other forms of transportation in which the cost per mile of the vehicle itself is considered to be the amount to be paid, and no reference to the amount of mail carried is involved.

I notice in your hearings that you considered all American aviation. They are paid for the number of miles flown and not by the poundage of the mail carried. If you want to find out the actual rate per pound-mile or per ton-mile you will first have to find out how many pounds of mail are carried, and how far. So, when you say casually that there is a subsidy involved, you labor under a misapprehension of the over-all fact if you do not consider likewise other forms of subsidy given to other forms of transportation, such as the ocean shipping, the rail system, and by bus or truck. So, I think, before we get too far in this subject of trying to make such charges of subsidy to air lines for carrying the mail, that we ought to consider all of those other facts in the total picture.

In reference to the inland waterways, for example, the Government of the United States has spent $4,000,000,000 on improving and maintaining the inland waterways, and yet those inland waterways are free to the users thereof. No charge whatever is made for it. That is also true of our rivers and harbors generally. No general charge that I know of is made for the use of river and harbor improvements or for the lighthouse service or the rescue service of the Coast Guard. There are a great many services that are performed by the public by governmental agencies that are free—free of any use charge whatsoever.

Some attention has been drawn to certain things that are being done to aid air navigation, and I would like to call the committee's attention to the fact that if we had not had these aids to air navigation before the war, we might have been in a very sad way for the conducting of our military and naval aviation. My committee considers aids to air navigation not only as aids to civil aviation, but likewise considers the importance of the establishment and building of these great highways of the air for the national defense. The Civil Aeronautics Act provides that in the event of war the entire aviation picture is available to the national defense set-up. In the last war, immediately on the declaration of war, the War and Navy Departments took over one-half of the civil air transport aircraft that were in service. They just took them over; they took over practically the complete operation of certain principal airports of the United States and all military planes, of course, had priority in any event, every place. They took on many of the civil pilots and the operating crews and ground crews and others and put them directly into the service of the armed services. Actually the civil air business is an auxiliary to the United States defense forces. It is not a separate institution that can go its own way as it pleases at all times.

A while ago, Mr. Chairman, you spoke about the so-called loran stations that are located on our coast. Loran is a gadget that was devised during the war as an aid to navigation on both land and sea. This has come to be a very important navigational aid for both aircraft and ships at sea.

We hope that a sufficient network, not a complete network, perhaps, but a sufficient network of these loran stations, which means long-range navigational aid, may be established so that our naval and land air and sea forces may have these aids available to them on instant notice in the event it is necessary for the United States to engage in any military operation or undertaking. It would be a very sad day indeed if all these aids were done away with, because they are aids to the national defense. I want to see a practical peacetime network of loran stations operated and maintained—mostly for the purpose of maintaining in regular operation a system that would be badly needed if we were attacked or even threatened. Loran has saved many an otherwise lost pilot and his ship and crew.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I should like first to address my remarks to the bogus economy claimed for this bill. I find a very interesting statement in the report of the committee. I call it interesting because when you review the facts you must wonder, and it arouses great interest, why such a statement would be in the report, as one of the reasons if not the main reason why the committee undertook to place a low guess on the amount of tax refunds that would be made next year and call that economy. I would have no objection to the committee's guessing if it had not written into the bill a limitation on the amount of tax refunds that could be made. As one, I say, if not the principal reason for this, the committee says on page 16 of the report:

> Coupled with the expectation of several million less taxpayers filing as a result of prospective changes in the tax laws, it is felt that the reduced figure would more nearly approximate the amount required for these rebates than the Bureau's estimate therefor.

I take it the committee means by this that it expects quite a sizable reduction in taxes later. Indeed, it says, "coupled with the expectation of several million less taxpayers." Now, how would that operate?

Out of my pay check, from the check of the automobile workers, the factory employee, the chain-store grocery clerk, out of the pay rolls of the workers of the United States of America, there are being withheld now taxes—witholding taxes. Those taxes are not being withheld at the rate which this committee expects to be written some time later; not at all, Mr. Chairman. The withholding taxes are being applied to the pay rolls at the present legal rate of taxation. So what will be the result if later on this year we reduce taxes? Is not the result obvious? It will result in larger claims for refunds, result in larger refunds rather than less. Indeed, I called the Bureau of Internal Revenue and asked what effect reduced taxes, a 20-percent reduction in taxes, would have on tax refunds. After some calculation they gave me the estimate that it would result in an additional $1,000,000,000 of tax refunds during the next fiscal year. Therefore, I wondered and, as I say, that is why I find this statement interesting; why it is that because of reduced taxes there will be less refunds. They say there will be several million less taxpayers. That means several million people who are now paying taxes will not be subject to taxes. Do you think those people are not going to claim refunds? Are you going to say in your tax bill that they are not entitled to refunds?

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I am curious to know why such an item as tax refunds should be considered as an expense to the Government. Certainly, the Government does not spend it in any way. It seems to me it is just giving back to the taxpayer what he paid in. It is not, in my view, properly a budget item and I wonder why it is in the bill at all.

Mr. GORE. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. He has stated better than I and illustrates better than I have the sham quality of this so-called economy. The gentleman is correct. This does not save one penny. Legal tax refunds will be made, no more, no less. It is not an expenditure of Government. If you and I overpay our taxes, the overpayment belongs to us under the law of the land.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think so, too.

Mr. GORE. Then to say that we are saving the taxpayers' money by placing a limit upon the amount of refunds which the Treasury can make is, I say, spurious.

Mr. HINSHAW. That may be, but at the same time it is in the President's budget. I do not see why it should be in anybody's budget. It is not a budgetary item, as I see it. It is not something that the Government is spending money for.

Mr. GORE. It is a disbursement from the Treasury.

Mr. HINSHAW. I suppose that is so.

Mr. GORE. A tax refund represents a disbursement from the Treasury. Of course, the Treasury can make no disbursement without the authorization of the Congress. May I point out to the gentleman the history of this amendment and procedure? For quite a number of years the appropriation bills did carry specific appropriations for tax refunds, but it became obvious to the Congress and to the fiscal authorities of the Government that it was impractical after the enactment of the withholding tax law. Then it was that many million taxpayers had a claim for refund. It then resulted, in 1 year, I believe, in Congress passing four deficiency appropriation bills to make it possible for the Treasury to make refunds. Therefore they adopted the practice of authorizing the Treasury and directing it to make refunds of taxes promptly in whatever amount the taxpayers were entitled to refunds.

I intend to offer an amendment tomorrow which will direct the Treasury to make prompt tax refunds. I am going to do that for two reasons. There are many small taxpayers who will have a claim for tax refund. These taxpayers need their money. I see no reason why Congress should prolong the time for paying these refunds to which the taxpayers are entitled. I think they should be made promptly. The second reason is I want to shorten the period the Government is required to pay 6 percent interest on refunds.

Mr. HINSHAW. I suggest at the same time that it is very difficult to anticipate in advance what the tax refunds may be, and very difficult to anticipate in advance how many of these black-market operators who did business in a cigar box will be caught and caused to pay up the proportionate taxes that they should have paid and which they did not pay. It is one of those things that you have to draw out of the air, it seems to me. I do not see how you can do any figuring on it.

Mr. GORE. By experience and careful analysis the Treasury Department can make calculations and estimates. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] said earlier today, their estimate of the amount of refunds was somewhat smaller in 1946 than actually resulted. The same was true the year before. I went down to see them today, and I asked the Commissioner, in the light of the facts today, what he thought the tax refunds for the next fiscal year would be. He said he thought the estimate they gave to the Budget was fairly close, but, if anything, it was too conservative. Why is that true?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] has again expired.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GORE. Every time we have a prolonged strike in the country it results in more tax refunds. When there is a recession in some major field of employment it results in more tax refunds, because the withholding tax provision and rate applies to the wages which have already been earned. The total tax liability is calculated, as you know, of course, upon total annual income.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does not the gentleman think it is up to us to get everybody busy and keep them that way so that we will get more taxes instead of less?

Mr. GORE. I was a supporter of the full-employment bill last year, and I am a supporter of programs now to keep this country on a going economy. As a matter of fact, I do not see how we can afford to allow it otherwise, because if this country ever goes into a depression like we had before and the national income falls to such a low level that our going expense of Government, what with our war-debt charges, veterans' programs, national defense, takes everything everybody makes, then our whole economy is gone.

Mr. HINSHAW. I agree with the gentleman completely.

Mr. GORE. I am delighted to have the fine and able and influential support of the gentleman from California and I will look forward to his assistance tomorrow.

Mr. HINSHAW. I did not promise the gentleman any assistance tomorrow but I agreed with the gentleman's last statement which he made, that if the country goes to the dogs it has gone to the dogs.

Mr. GORE. I am delighted to know that one gentleman on that side is being a little careful with his commitments.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. In the matter of estimates, I had the figures last week. However, I do not remember them exactly, but I think the President estimated the tax refunds for 1946 would be somewhere in the neighborhood of a little over $3,000,000,000. The payments were actually about $3,000,000,000. In other words, the Treasury Department estimated within about $50,000,000 on a figure as large as $3,000,000,000. So that they can really do it. I also want to call attention to the fact that many of these refunds are necessary by reason of the excess profits income refund provision of the law. All of those claims have not been settled yet, and that is the reason that there will necessarily be a large amount of them to be paid.

Mr. GORE. Is the gentleman referring to the carry-back provisions?

Mr. EBERHARTER. The carry-back and carry-forward provisions. Then, there is another item which this committee has not taken into consideration. There are many billions of dollars of claims in the Treasury Department right now under section 722 of the Internal Revenue Code, which the Treasury Department has not passed upon; has not even commenced to consider. They set up a special counsel in order to develop procedure in order to settle those claims. Very few of them have been settled. Those claims have been considered which are for less than $100,000. All claims of more than $100,000 have not been considered by the Treasury Department or the special counsel set up. So we have got those to look forward to when it comes to making calculations insofar as saving the taxpayer's money and setting up a strait-jacket budget is concerned.

Mr. GORE. I will point out to the gentleman one other provision of law which the Congress enacted in the war years, and that is this amortization of plant provision. Some of those claims have not been settled. And I want to point out further to the gentleman that whenever those claims are adjudicated, at whatever amount is determined we are required to refund, the amount will bear 6 percent interest. If somebody else does not, I expect to offer an amendment tomorrow limiting this appropriation to the payment of a lower interest, and I expect to limit it far below the 6-percent rate.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. Does not the gentleman believe it would be wise before criticizing this $800,000,000 item to find out whether the majority party intends to include it in their promised $6,000,000,000 Budget cut? Is this a part of the Budget cut or not, this $800,000,000?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee to answer the able young gentleman's question, a pertinent one.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will answer that after a while.

Mr. ALBERT. I should like to have the answer now.

Mr. CANFIELD. The President included that item in his estimate of expenditures. It is included here.

Mr. GORE. Then it is a part of the proposed $6,000,000,000 saving. It is a bogus part, my friend.

I understood from the previous remarks of the gentleman from Illinois that he was going to undertake to show that there was some legerdemain within the Treasury Department to make a larger amount of the refunds come due within the next fiscal year. I do not know upon what the gentleman intends to base that argument. I can assure him, however, that there is no basis for it. In 1945 there was a tax refund of $904,000,000. In the fiscal year 1946 there was a tax refund of $3,310,000,000. In the fiscal year 1947 it is anticipated that there will be a refund of $2,108,000,000. As of March 7, as the daily Treasury statement will show, already $1,200,000,000 has been disbursed for tax refunds.

It is estimated in the budget that for the fiscal year 1948 there will be $2,031,000,000 tax refund.

If the gentleman intends to cite the fact that 1946 was higher than either of the other 4 years I should like to point out that then we had a pyramiding of the carry-back and the amortization provisions of the tax law.

I wish now to come to the question of appropriations for the investigative staff of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. I know of course the statement is frequently made that the war is over and we ought to collect taxes more cheaply. The war is over so far as the shooting is concerned, but as pointed out by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, a great many provisions of the tax law resulting from the war and growing out of the war have brought about thousands of claims, many large claims now remaining undetermined in the Bureau of Internal Revenue. To cut down on the staff determining the validity of these claims would prolong the period during which they will draw 6 percent interest. We passed a deficiency bill in the House the other day and left out a provision necessary to make rapid determinations before April 15 of refunds. You will find a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury setting this out on page 1704 of the RECORD. It was placed in the RECORD by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of another body.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, the law on refunds provides that the Government shall have a grace period of 30 days. The taxes being due on March 15, if the refund check is mailed out before April 15 there is no interest on the amount during that 30-day period of grace for the Government; therefore it makes necessary that very rapid determinations be made in order to save that 6 percent interest and, mind you, that is no small figure. It is estimated that the item of interest will this year amount to $80,000,000, a very sizable sum, more than five times the amount you reduce the Post Office Department. Indeed, it represents a sum equal to the total savings you made in the entire Treasury Department appropriation bill.

The gentleman from Illinois said that in cutting down on the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the tax-collecting appropriation he did not intend that the field staff be reduced. I notice here in the report, page 14: "It is not contemplated, however, that there should be any drastic curtailment in the servicing functions of the Bureau."

Just in which bucket on which shoulder do you have the water, or are you carrying water on both shoulders?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman better read that again.

Mr. GORE. Does the gentleman want it read again?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No. Read the entire context.

Mr. GORE. The whole page or the sentence?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; that portion which relates to enforcement activities.

Mr. GORE. That is on one page and this sentence is on the other page, but they both apply to the same cut. That is the reason I am pointing out the inconsistency of the gentleman's statement. As a matter of fact the reduction in personnel which will inevitably result from this cut, if it stands, is a reduction in the investigatory staff. I would like to point out with what result investigations have been made in recent months. But before doing that, I would like to say to the Chairman and members of this Committee that, in my studied opinion, there are many millions of dollars owed the Government in taxes now which the Bureau of Internal Revenue is not collecting. There are many people who have never filed a return, who are obligated by the laws of the land to pay taxes on the income they have received. With the funds which the Bureau of Internal Revenue has now, it is only able to investigate 3 percent of the returns filed, to say nothing of these people who have not filed any returns but who should have. You know, we have a program of balancing the budget, and I am wholeheartedly for it and have so said publicly many times, but you cannot balance the budget by shooting the tax collectors.

During the fiscal year 1945, with an average of 19,000 enforcement officers, the Government collected over $1,000,000,000 which they would not have collected had these investigations not been made. In 1944, to go back a year further, with only 16,000 enforcement officers, the Government collected $814,000,000 which it would not have collected otherwise. In 1946, the collecting, enforcement officer, and investigating staff was increased to 24,000. With what result? The Government collected $1,478,000,000 which it would not have collected had it not been for the investigations. Let us not be penny-foolish.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I asked the Housing Expediter, Mr. Creedon, to give me an up-to-date report on the administration of the Veterans' Emergency Housing Act of 1946, which was sponsored by me in the Seventy-ninth Congress, and became a law May 22, 1946.

Mr. Creedon's letter, containing the report, is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE HOUSING EXPEDITER,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1947.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PATMAN: For several weeks prior to March 1, there were increasing indications of opposition to the Veterans' Emergency Housing Act of 1946. That opposition reached a climax when the directorate of the National Association of Home Builders approved resolutions recommending that all controls on construction be eliminated. Backing up these resolutions were statements made by representatives of industry as well as statements made by individual members of several veterans' organizations and by Congressman WOLCOTT. For these reasons I felt that it was time for us to take stock of the housing program, to determine what the veterans themselves want, and to reach a definite conclusion as to whether controls should be continued as they now exist, should be relaxed, or should be entirely eliminated as suggested by the home builders and some other representatives of industry.

Therefore, on March 3, I addressed a letter similar to the attached to the national commanders of five veterans' organizations, namely, the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, American Veterans of World War II, Disabled American Veterans, and the American Veterans Committee, Inc.

Subsequently on March 5, 6, and 7, I held meetings with each of these national commanders and their chosen representatives to get their official views on each of the nine controls set out in the attached letter. The official position of each organization is shown on the attached summary.

You will note that the veterans' organizations are unanimous in supporting all of the controls listed with one exception. AMVETS recommended that rental ceilings on new construction be eliminated, and VFW recommended that consideration be given to the elimination of rent ceilings on new construction.

I am sure that you are familiar with each of the controls listed in the attached letter and that you are also familiar with the purpose of those controls. However, you might like to know my own position with regard to those controls and particularly the reasons why I think those controls should be continued for some time to come—certainly until the supply of building materials and the availability of construction labor justify their elimination.

The first of the controls mentioned is the construction limitation order (VHP-1), which restricts construction of nonessential and deferrable nonresidential construction and of luxury-type residential construction. This is the basic order which has the most direct relationship to the success of the veterans' emergency housing program. Without this order a huge volume of nonresidential and deferrable nonresidential construction and a considerable volume of luxury-type housing would go forward. That construction, as you well know, could result only in increasing demands for scarce building materials and for scarce construction labor. Without the control, there would be a mad scramble for materials and labor, and home builders would be outbid for both. Without the control, fewer homes would be started, fewer would be completed; construction would be delayed, and cost would increase.

The second control is the allocation of a few basic raw materials, such as pig iron, to producers of building materials in critically short supply. This office is trying to reach voluntary agreements with industry which will permit the elimination of allocations. We have already been successful in making an agreement with the steel industry which will result in as much steel going to producers of housing items during each quarter of 1947 as was allocated to housing items during the first quarter of 1947. We have made an entirely satisfactory agreement with the producers of phenolic resins. We have made a partially satisfactory agreement with the producers of pig iron covering items other than cast-iron soil pipe. However, we have been unable thus far to negotiate with the producers of shop grade lumber, which is badly needed for millwork, and with the producers of paper liner, which is needed for gypsum board and lath. We have been unable to reach a satisfactory agreement with the producers of pig iron with regard to supplying pig iron for cast-iron soil pipe. In the latter material alone we know that failure to continue allocations will resut in as much as a 50 percent reduction in the production of cast-iron soil pipe which is one of the most critical items for housing. Therefore, unless and until we are able to make an agreement with regard to the three last named items, it is necessary that allocations be continued or housing construction will suffer for lack of materials.

The third control is one designed to provide special assistance to building materials producers in securing necessary equipment and machinery. We have numerous cases presented to us where, for lack of a motor or some other item of machinery or equipment, a plant producing building materials cannot maintain its production or cannot increase its production. It is obvious, therefore, that we must provide this type of assistance to help producers keep their plants in operation or bring them into operation. I am frank to say that such assistance to producers of building materials has not, to the best of my knowledge, had any adverse effect on the balance of the economy.

The limitation to one completed bathroom and to a total floor area of 1,500 square feet and the requirement that housing be suitable for year-round occupancy, are very obviously designed to prevent the building of luxury-type homes. The first mentioned spreads the available supply of bathroom fixtures over a greater number of dwelling units. We will be glad to eliminate the control whenever the supply of those fixtures comes to near balance with demand. The second of these controls is also designed to conserve building materials. There can be no question that luxury type houses require a disproportionate amount of material and labor. Therefore, to eliminate the restriction at this time would of necessity result in a fewer number of families being housed in new construction. The third of these controls prevents the building of resort cottages and similar types of homes which at best serve only a seasonal demand.

The last three controls, rent ceilings on new construction, veterans' preferences, and sales price and rental ceilings on HH priority constructed houses, are for the benefit of the veterans. Rent controls on new construction are now being considered by the Congress, consequently they will be retained pending congressional determination. However, the builders themselves have stated upon numerous occasions that the rent formulas employed by FHA enable investors to receive a fair return on their investment. The veterans' preference is required under the Patman Act, and unless there is congressional action I have no authority to make any change in that control. There have been instances where the requirement that houses be held for sale to a veteran during construction and for 60 days thereafter, has worked a hardship on builders. We recognized that hardship by authorizing the FHA to make exceptions where a builder showed that he was unable to dispose of homes which he had built for sale within a period of 30 days after completion. To the best of my knowledge the exception which we have authorized eliminates any question of builder hardship resulting from the veterans' preference. The sales price and rent ceilings established under the HH priority system were directed toward one end—preventing veterans from being overcharged. The builders are protected from loss by reason of increased cost during construction in that they may apply to the FHA for an increase in sales price or rental ceiling to the extent justified by the increase in costs over which they had no control. The builders have advanced several reasons why the controls should be eliminated. They say that they are placed in an unfair competitive position with regard to housing started under the permit system. We have met this objection by permitting the installation of additional facilities, such as a garage, hardwood flooring, a different type furnace, etc., with the increased cost added to the originally established sales price. The builders strenuously object to compliance and enforcement requirements in connection with HH sales price ceilings. However, the veterans themselves insist on strict compliance and enforcement. The builders state that they could in many instances sell the homes which they have constructed at a price greater than that which will be allowed them by the FHA, even after adding the increased cost over which the builders had no control. I believe the answer to this is that the builders secured authorization to build and definite benefits from the HH priority in return for which they accepted obligations beneficial to veterans. To eliminate the sales price ceiling at this time would give the builders tne benefits without holding them accountable for the obligations running with those benefits.

The attitude of the veterans' organizations is plain and beyond controversy as a result of the recent meetings. Therefore, I am continuing to maintain the controls which I enumerated in my letter unless the Congress directs a different policy. I believe that the veterans' emergency housing program was conceived because of the veterans' need. It is evident from the actions of the veterans' organizations that I have not misjudged the need. We have a continued responsibility to do everything that we can to meet that need.

I am sending this information because I know of your intense interest in the housing program being carried out under the Veterans' Emergency Housing Act of 1946, which you introduced in Congress.

In order that you may be fully apprised of the attitude of the veterans' organizations, I am enclosing copies of press releases issued by the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, AMVETS, and the American Veterans Committee. I am also enclosing a copy of a press release issued after my meetings with the commanders of the several organizations and a copy of the speech I made before the annual convention of the National Association of Home Builders in Chicago on February 25.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK R. CREEDON,
Housing Expediter.

I am also inserting herewith press releases disclosing the attitude of veterans' organizations, a summary of their conclusions, an address delivered by Mr. Creedon, and other information relating to this subject:

OFFICE OF THE HOUSING EXPEDITER,
Washington D. C., March 3, 1947.

Mr. PAUL H. GRIFFITH,
National Commander, American Legion, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GRIFFITH: At a recent convention of the National Association of Home Builders in Chicago, representatives of several veterans' organizations indicated that they favored the removal of sales price ceilings on HH priority-constructed houses. Members of the building industry attending the convention also adopted various resolutions calling for the removal of other housing controls still in force.

As you know, housing controls have been relaxed whenever I deemed that the changing situation warranted such action. The proposals made at the Chicago convention, however, are directed at the elimination of all controls. The basic controls and restrictions still in force are:

1. The construction limitation order which restricts nonresidential construction.

2. The allocation of a few raw materials, such as pig iron, to producers of building materials in critically short supply.

3. Special assistance to building materials producers in securing necessary equipment and machinery.

4. Limitation to one completed bathroom.

5. Limitation to a total floor area of 1,500 square feet.

6. Requirement that housing be suitable for year-round occupancy.

7. Rent ceilings on new construction.

8. Veterans' preferences.

9. Sales price and rent ceilings on HH priority-constructed houses.

In considering the proposals made at the convention in Chicago I would like very much to have the comments and recommendations of the American Legion on each of these controls. If it is convenient for you, I should like to discuss these matters with you, the chairman of your national housing committee, and any other of your representatives in my office at 10 a. m. on March 7, 1947. If the time suggested for the meeting is not satisfactory, I will be glad to adjust it to your convenience. The meeting will not be a joint one with other veterans' organizations.

My own views on each of these controls are expressed in a talk which I made at the NAHB convention earlier in the week. I am enclosing a copy of this for your information.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK R. CREEDON,
Housing Expediter.

A similar letter was sent to commanders of other veterans' organizations at the same time.

National Commander Paul H. Griffith, of the American Legion, Thursday, March 6, urged the National Housing Expediter to maintain rigid controls on all nonresidential construction.

The recommendation was made in response to a request by Housing Expediter Frank Creedon for comments by the Legion on nine basic housing controls and restrictions still in force.

In asking for recommendations by the American Legion, Mr. Creedon pointed out that he favors relaxing controls whenever a changing situation warranted such action.

Commander Griffith and Mr. Creedon discussed housing Thursday afternoon at Legion national branch headquarters, 1608 K Street NW.

A listing of the controls, and the Legion's recommendations thereon, follow:

1. Control: The construction limitation order which restricts nonresidential construction.

Legion position: Rigid controls on all nonresidential construction should be maintained. Despite the fact that Congress yesterday trimmed the deficiency appropriation of the agency which is administering VHP–1, we say Congress should provide funds to some governmental agency for the purpose of controlling this type of construction.

2. Control: The allocation of a few basic raw materials, such as pig iron, to producers of building materials in critically short supply.

Legion position: We recommend the allocation of raw materials to manufacturers be continued. Congress should provide funds for the purpose of administering these allocations, whether by CPA or some other governmental agency.

3. Control: Special assistance to building-materials producers in securing necessary equipment and machinery.

Legion position: We recommend assistance to building materials producers in securing equipment and machinery.

4. Control: Limitation to one completed bathroom.

Legion position: We recommend continuance of the policy of one completed bathroom in each house until the supply of bathroom fixtures comes somewhere near the demand.

5. Control: Limitation to a total floor area of 1,500 square feet.

Legion position: We believe the square-foot limitation of 1,500 square feet on the size of houses should be continued. To eliminate this restriction could not but result in a lesser number of families housed by new construction.

6. Control: Requirement that housing be suitable for year-round occupancy.

Legion position: We believe the regulation requiring housing to be suitable for year-round occupancy is sound; for it to be otherwise could result in an unnecessary drain on our already limited materials and labor for the erection of purely seasonal houses.

7. Control: Rent ceilings on new construction.

Legion position: We recommend that rent controls on new construction be continued. Under the realistic rent formulas employed by FHA, the operators are in the position of receiving a fair return on their investment.

8. Control: Veterans' preferences.

Legion position: Veterans' preference should be continued.

9. Control: Sales price and rent ceilings on HH priority-constructed houses.

Legion position: Sales price and rent ceilings on HH priority-constructed houses should be maintained.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4, 1947.—Rent control, guaranteed markets for producers of new building materials and mass privately produced housing, and long-range, low-interest loans to builders of rental housing for veterans, were "musts" submitted to Housing Expediter Frank Creedon by Commander-in-Chief Louis E. Starr, Veterans of Foreign Wars, during a conference today.

Starr also called for continued limitation of nonhousing construction. He urged the allocation of basic raw materials to producers of materials for housing if any semblance of a veterans' housing program is to bring relief to veterans.

VFW's views are expressed in 12 points. They follow:

1. Continued rent control.

2. Guaranteed markets for new materials and producers of prefabricated and industrial houses.

3. Long-range, low-interest loans to builders of rental units.

4. Limitation on nonresidential construction.

5. Allocation of basic raw materials now in short supply into housing materials.

6. Special assistance to building-material producers in securing equipment and machinery.

7. Limitation to one completed bathroom for new homes.

8. Limitation to 1,500 square feet floor areas in new construction.

9. Requirement that housing construction must be limited to year-round occupancy; eliminating beach homes, pleasure resorts, etc.

10. Consider lifting ceilings on new rental construction to stimulate large-scale development.

11. Veterans' preference on new homes for sale or rent should remain in effect if we are to have a veterans' emergency program.

12. Sales prices on HH priority-constructed homes should continue as protection to veterans who have made deposits and agreed upon sales and terms.

AMVETS OF WORLD WAR NO. II

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7.—The AMVETS today announced general support of Frank R. Creedon, Housing Expediter, in his efforts to continue channeling scarce material into veterans housing; to prohibit the construction of large-size luxury mansions during the acute housing shortage; to limit nonhousing construction; to retain veterans' preferences; to retain sales prices and rent ceilings on HH priority-constructed houses.

However, in the belief that rent ceilings on new houses are already too high to be of assistance to the great mass of veterans and in an effort to expedite new construction, AMVETS National Commander, Ray Sawyer announced that the AMVETS national executive committee had voted in favor of removing rent ceilings on newly constructed houses and apartments.

The announcement followed a conference between Mr. Creedon and his staff and the AMVETS, national commander, accompanied by Allen P. Solada, executive director, Robert L. McLaughlin, legislative director; and Roscoe L. Barrow, chairman of the AMVETS national housing committee.

AMERICAN VETERANS COMMITTEE (AVC)

WASHINGTON.—Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., national housing chairman of the American Veterans Committee (AVC), today attacked the proposal of the National Association of Home Builders that all housing controls be removed "as an indication that this group is not interested in constructing the type of low-cost housing veterans need."

In reply to a request from Housing Expediter Frank Creedon for AVC's recommendations on retention of existing controls, Roosevelt said: "The AVC believes that in the face of the continuing housing emergency all controls which aid in the construction of housing at minimum price levels must be retained. We feel that the following controls fall into this category:

"1. The construction order which limits nonresidential construction. This is one of the most important of existing controls. It is reported that over-all building costs are up 86 percent over 1939 and have reached an all-time peak. If the present limitation on nonresidential construction is lifted, nearly all builders would turn to the more profitable commercial construction.

"2. The allocation of such basic raw materials as pig iron to producers of building materials in critically short supply.

"3. Special assistance to building-materials producers in securing necessary equipment and machinery.

"4. Limitation to one completed bathroom.

"5. Limitation to a total floor area of 1,500 square feet.

"6. Requirement that housing be suitable for year-round occupancy.

"7. Rent ceilings on new construction. As housing officials have pointed out, removal of these ceilings would not result in additional construction but would mean exorbitant rentals.

"8. Veterans' preferences.

"9. Sales prices and rent ceilings on HH priority constructed houses.

"10. Guaranteed market provisions."

Roosevelt said that AVC concurred in the statement of Mr. Creedon that the controls remaining in effect should be maintained to prevent a mad scramble by the entire building industry for scarce materials and labor.

"If we are to obtain the goal of 1,000,000 houses for 1947, every aid must be given to the housing builder," Roosevelt said. "Not only must existing controls be retained but a determined effort must be made to find ways and means of bringing down construction costs. A recent survey by the Wall Street Journal indicates that builders are curtailing their programs up to 90 and 95 percent because of current record high costs. Any action which would further increase housing costs is a direct blow at the homeless veteran."

Roosevelt said that a minimum housing program for veterans included retention of existing controls, continuation of rent controls for another year, and speedy passage of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft housing bill.

Roosevelt's recommendations were presented to the Housing Expediter today by Chat Paterson, AVC's national legislative representative. The recommendations of the VFW, Legion, AMVETS, and DAV were also presented to Mr. Creedon this week in response to his request for the attitudes of the five major veterans' organizations on the proposal of the National Association of Home Builders that all controls be removed.

OFFICE OF THE HOUSING EXPEDITER

MARCH 9, 1947.—Housing Expediter Frank R. Creedon said today that any doubt or uncertainty as to whether the veterans' organizations want the present housing program continued in full force and effect has been removed as the result of conferences he has just held with the heads of the five major veterans' organizations or their representatives.

Mr. Creedon met individually this week with National Commander Paul M. Griffith, of the American Legion; Commander in Chief Louis E. Starr, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars; National Commander Ray Sawyer, of the American Veterans of World War II; Chat Paterson, representing National Chairman Charles G. Bolte, of the American Veterans Committee; and Earl G. Hendrick, representing National Commander Lloyd F. Oleson, of the Disabled American Veterans.

"I asked them to meet with me to clear up uncertainties that arose recently over conflicting reports as to the attitude of the veterans' organization toward the housing program," Mr. Creedon said. "The conferences were set up as a result of a letter I sent to the heads of the veterans' organizations, in which I stated that recent industry recommendations and the statements of members of some of the veterans' organizations indicated they favored the removal of sales price ceilings on National Housing priority-constructed houses. I further pointed out that some industry members favored removing all housing controls still in effect.

"In the letter I called attention to the fact that housing controls have been relaxed whenever I deemed that the changing situation warranted such action, but that some proposals were directed at the elimination of all controls.

"I then listed nine basic controls and restrictions still in force, and wrote the heads of the veterans' organizations that I would like very much to have their comments and recommendations on each of these controls; and I stated, further, that I would like to discuss these matters with each of them individually.

"My purpose, of course, was to determine beyond any question whether each of the veterans' organizations wanted the program continued in its present form, or whether it thought certain of the existing controls should be continued and others dropped, or whether it recommended abandoning the entire program.

"Their answers were unequivocal. All five of the organizations made it clear that they wanted the present program continued as is.

"Mr. Griffith of the Legion urged the retention of all nine points. He urged me to maintain rigid controls on all nonhousing construction, and stated that Congress should provide funds to some governmental agency to control this type of construction as well as to administer the allocation of raw materials to manufacturers of scarce building materials. He said the one completed bathroom control should be continued until the supply of bathroom fixtures comes somewhere near demand; that the 1,500-square-foot limitation should be continued, because, he said, its elimination would result in the construction of fewer homes; and that the year-round occupancy control should be retained to prevent an unnecessary drain on materials and labor for purely seasonal houses. Mr. Griffith said rent ceilings on new construction should be continued, because, he said, FHA's rent formulas provide a fair return on their investment.

"Mr. Starr of VFW favored retention of eight of the nine points and added three of his own—continued rent control on existing homes, guaranteed markets for new materials and producers of prefabricated and industrial homes, and long-range, low-interest-rate loans to builders of rental units. He questioned only one of the points—ceilings on new rental construction—and suggested I consider lifting it if such action would stimulate the construction of rental housing.

"Mr. Sawyer of AMVETS announced support of his organization on eight of the nine points. In the case of rent ceilings on new housing, he said that AMVETS' national executive committee had already taken action in favor of removing rent ceilings on newly constructed houses and apartments.

"Mr. Patterson of AVC and Mr. Hendrick of the DAV urged continuation of the entire program, strongly endorsing all nine points.

"These conferences with the veterans' organizations have been most helpful in clarifying the atmosphere. There is no longer any doubt that the veterans' organizations want a housing program nor is there doubt as to what kind of program they want. On the basis of their recommendations, I as Housing Expediter intend to continue as long as necessary the existing programs on which there was unanimity of opinion on the part of the veterans' organizations. The whole subject of rent control is before Congress. Consequently, rent ceilings on new construction will be retained pending consideration of this matter by the Congress."

The 9-point control program on which the veterans organizations were asked to comment and make recommendations point-by-point follows:

1. The construction limitation order which restricts nonresidential construction.
2. The allocation of a few basic raw materials, such as pig iron, to producers of building materials in critically short supply.
3. Special assistance to building materials producers in securing necessary equipment and machinery.
4. Limitation to one completed bathroom.
5. Limitation to a total floor area of 1,500 square feet.
6. Requirement that housing be suitable for year-round occupancy.
7. Rent ceilings on new construction.
8. Veterans' preference.
9. Sales prices and rent ceilings on HH priority-constructed houses.

SPEECH OF HOUSING EXPEDITER FRANK R. CREEDON AT THE FOURTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF HOME BUILDERS, HOTEL STEVENS, CHICAGO, ILL., FEBRUARY 25, 1947

I have heard it stated that the 12,000 members of this association build more than three-fourths of the homes and apartments erected each year in America. Next to the veteran searching for a place to live, you are the group most vitally concerned with the housing outlook. I have been Housing Expediter now for about 2 months. I think it most opportune that I am permitted to talk to you at this time and I wish to thank you for inviting me here.

I shall try to explain the actions I have taken since I assumed office and to tell you what I see the outlook to be for the balance of this year. All of the policies of the Office of the Housing Expediter are being formulated in an atmosphere of an orderly retreat from war. The Nation is fast approaching a return to a free, unfettered economy. The administration is directing its energies toward this goal.

Within this general spirit of decontrol, and within 48 hours after I assumed office, I eliminated the sales price ceiling on new houses, except those constructed with the aid of HH priorities. I eliminated the complex priority system, and the even more complicated schedule B to Priorities Regulation 33. I substituted a simple permit system authorizing construction. I rescinded the regulation which prohibited nonveterans from building for their own occupancy. I believed this prohibition to be undemocratic—and I know that it prevented many homes being started. I changed the former $80 per month rental ceiling on apartment housing to a ceiling of an average of $80 per month. Statistics indicate that this average ceiling is sufficient for almost every section of the country. However, just a few days ago, as Housing Expediter, I authorized the Federal Housing Administration to raise the $80 average shelter rent to a maximum of approximately $30 to $32 per month, per room, including service charges, in the very large metropolitan areas where hardship would result from inability to build under the $80 average rent ceiling.

I recently issued instructions to relax the provision that a builder must hold each and every house in a project for purchase by a veteran for a period of 60 days after its completion. This revision is covered by FHA Bulletin H. P. S. 13, dated February 13, 1947.

Also, I have just issued instructions to permit the sales prices of dwellings, built with HH priorities, to be increased beyond the previously imposed ceiling of $10,000 (and $17,000 for two-family dwellings) to cover the increased cost of highly desired conveniences previously omitted in order to keep costs within these ceilings. This revision is covered by FHA Bulletin H. P. S. 15, dated February 18, 1947.

I believe it appropriate at this time to mention the premium-payment program which played its part in increasing the production of certain building materials in short supply. This program lost much of its effectiveness with the removal of price controls. We have carefully reviewed the program and have already reduced the total number of plans in effect from 11 to 4. Of these four, two are scheduled to terminate March 31—housing nails and timber cruising teams. This leaves only the premium-payment plans on merchant pig iron and cast iron soil pipe, both of which expire on June 30. These two plans can and will be extended if it is determined that without them housing will suffer. The premium-payment plans have been important tools in getting record or near-record increases in the shortest possible time on several of the most critical building materials.

Another important factor in obtaining the large increase in many critical building materials thus far achieved has been Government allocation of basic raw materials to manufacturers of certain building products. It is highly important that the supply of these basic raw materials be continued. I intend to see that they are continued either by Government directive or by voluntary agreements reached between the Government and the manufacturers of these basic raw materials. As an example of a voluntary agreement just entered into, I am pleased to announce that the steel industry has agreed, on a voluntary basis, to supply approximately the same tonnage of steel to the same end product building items for each of the remaining quarters of 1947, as the industry did in the first quarter of 1947.

To stimulate the construction of rental housing projects, both large and small, the FHA is offering liberalized provisions and incentives to builders of rental housing. FHA now insures mortgages on rental housing projects up to 90 percent of current costs, including land. FHA estimates that with an insured mortgage loan an efficient operator may recover through the mortgage substantially all of his cash expenditure. As a further incentive to operators in establishing initial rentals, FHA authorizes an anticipated net return of 6½ percent, with a 7 percent vacancy allowance. With the 100-percent occupany which can reasonably be expected for several years, the operator will actually be getting a substantially higher net return. As I stated earlier, where the $80 average rent ceiling prohibits rental construction in the very large metropolitan areas, I have authorized FHA to make special administrative exceptions on the basis of hardship.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue has entered the picture to permit accelerated depreciation of rental-housing projects for income tax purposes. As an additional aid, the FHA has simplified requirements as to application forms, preliminary drawings, specifications, and exhibits. In fact, FHA is maintaining a continuous study of ways and means to cut red tape for builders. In this connection, I would like to point out that FHA has recently instructed its field offices that FHA minimum property requirements for multifamily dwelling units are to be used as guides only.

I have recited these actions as proof positive that I do not retain any controls just for controls' sake, and also as assurance that I intend to lift the remaining controls at the earliest possible moment consistent with the aims of the housing program and with proper consideration for the economy of the country as a whole.

Despite the anxiety and wholesome desire of everyone to be free of Government controls, we should not lose sight of the fact that Government controls were imposed for a worthy purpose. That purpose was to win the war. I do not believe any single one of you would deny the effectiveness of controls in achieving that purpose. The controls remaining in effect are being maintained because I believe that without these controls there would result a mad scramble by the entire building industry for scarce materials and labor. The net result would be not only a great number of uncompleted construction projects, but a great number of uncompleted dwellings, with the result that homes which are already costing too much to build would cost a great deal more. In our desire to remove controls, we should not lose sight of the purpose of controls and we should not remove any control if, by removing, we sacrifice the purpose for which the control was established.

Now, let's take a look at these controls which we have kept and see what they are and the reasons why we are keeping them.

Veterans' preference, except for the modification previously mentioned, will be maintained for houses and apartments built during 1947. You are familiar with this preference. It requires that houses be held for veterans' purchase during construction and for 60 days after completion and that rental units be offered to veterans exclusively for 30 days in the same manner. I do not believe anyone here will quarrel with that control, as modified. Moreover, it is required under the Patman Act.

We are maintaining the limitation on nonresidential construction, otherwise known as VHP–1. We have recently raised the limit, as you know, from $35,000,000 per week to $50,000,000. The chief reason for this raise in the limit was the increase in material and labor costs. We do not intend to increase this $50,000,000 limit until the material and labor situation justify a change. During the period from March 24, 1946 when VHP–1 was put into effect, to February 1, 1947, a total of $2,000,000,000 in nonresidential construction was denied. I do not think that there is a man in this room who believes that the 1947 housing program would have the chance that it needs and deserves if this tidal wave of nonresidential construction was allowed to sweep over the country. Not only would the materials situation become utterly chaotic, but the bidding for labor and building materials would end in costs spiralling upward.

We will continue the square-foot limitation on the size of houses. The only purpose of this restriction is to prevent the construction of luxury-type houses which use a disproportionate amount of material and labor. To eliminate this restriction could not but result in a lesser number of families housed by new construction. The further limitation of one completed bathroom to a house is for the purpose of spreading the available supply of bathroom fixtures over a greater number of dwelling units. In the recent survey conducted by your association, plumbing fixtures were listed as the fourth most serious bottleneck in the building-material field. I will be very happy to eliminate this control just as soon as I can be assured that the supply of bathroom fixtures comes somewhere near the demand.

I do not believe that these remaining controls, onerous as they may seem in specific instances, when viewed in the light of the purpose for which they are imposed, can be said to be anything but helpful to the housing program, and you, even more than I, who live with the problem from day to day, can well recognize that fact.

Your performance last year was truly remarkable, all things considered. You started over 630,000 new, conventional homes and completed nearly 450,000. Building material supplies have made phenomenal gains. Present indications are that there will be building material enough for starting and completing about 1,000,000 homes in 1947, providing the program outlined above is adhered to. I have every confidence that you, you home builders, will achieve the recognized needed objective of 1,000,000 homes and apartments under construction this year.

The main emphasis will be and should be on the construction of a huge volume of rental housing. Surveys by the Census Bureau, Veterans' Administration, other Government agencies, and by private groups, have all shown that the great majority of veterans are unable financially to undertake the purchase of a home in today's market. Most veterans are young, many are still in school. Others are in job training and many have not yet selected the community in which they will settle permanently.

While I am optimistic about the housing outlook, I do not want any of you to think that we are without further problems or that the housing situation is practically solved. Far from it—the building material and labor situations are still serious problems, but I do believe that the cost of building materials, and more particularly the cost of construction, during the coming months will level off if they do not actually decline. It is my firm belief that the 1947 housing program is more your program than it is the Government's. It is up to you to get homes and apartments built for veterans. The home building industry has its big chance in 1947. I repeat that I have relaxed or eliminated practically all controls that have hindered you in the past. I am retaining only those controls without which you would not have even the share of scarce materials and labor that is available to you today.

You and I, you as the home builders of the Nation—I, as Housing Expediter within the framework of the Patman act, have as yet an unfulfilled obligation to the men and women who served their country in time of war. You have proven your ability to overcome obstacles in the past. Working together, I know you can and will build more houses and apartments in 1947 than were ever before built in a similar period.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—OFFICE OF SELECTIVE SERVICE RECORDS (H. DOC. NO. 168)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States which was read by the Clerk and, together with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Armed Services and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message of March 3, 1947, to the Congress, I recommended that there be no extension of the Selective Training and Service Act at this time. Because I am confident that the Congress and the Nation stand ready both now and in the future to take such action as may be necessary to assure the security of the Nation, and because there are now reasonably good prospects of maintaining at adequate strength the Army and Navy without resort to selective service, I believe we can liquidate the Selective Service System, except for its records. Since the act expires on March 31, 1947, we are faced with the immediate need of providing for the consolidation and preservation of records and providing for liquidation of the Selective Service System.

In order to provide for the orderly and expeditious liquidation of the Selective Service System, and to take care of storage and servicing of the records of the System, I recommend the establishment of an Office of Selective Service Records. It will be the duty of this office to begin immediately the liquidation of all local board offices, and to centralize at suitable locations in each State the valuable accumulation of records for safekeeping, in the event such records are needed in the future. It would not be the part of wisdom to destroy such records until their value has disappeared.

In the immediate future there are certain values to the veterans themselves and to the Nation in retaining and servicing the records apart from reasons of national security. During the last 6 months of 1946, the Selective Service System complied with more than 1,000,000 requests from State and Federal agencies for information about veterans. A large number of these requests were in the interest of veterans as individuals. It is desirable to continue to make use of the records in this manner, while at the same time assuring that the confidential nature of these records should not be violated.

I recommend, therefore, the enactment of a law providing for:

(1) The establishment of an Office of Selective Service Records which will (a) liquidate the Selective Service System, and (b) establish and maintain Federal record depots in the several States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories and possessions of the United States.

(2) Transfer to the Office of Selective Service Records all property, records, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations of the Selective Service System; and

(3) The continuance of the confidential nature of selective service records transferred to the Office of Selective Service Records with a provision for penalties for violations thereof.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 10, 1947.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD] is recognized for 30 minutes.

LILIENTHAL—COMMUNISM SMEAR TECHNIQUE AND BASIC TRUTHS ON ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I asked for this 30 minutes to present some remarks on the confirmation of Mr. Lilienthal, to comment on the misuse of the word "communism" as a smear technique, and to present certain basic truths on atomic energy. However, due to the lateness of the hour, I am going to ask to be allowed to extend my remarks at this point and to include at certain points in my address certain corollary information:

First. A list of witnesses testifying in confirmation of and in opposition to Mr. Lilienthal.

Second. An excerpt from Mr. Lilienthal's testimony; and Third. Some basic facts on atomic energy as compiled by the National Committee on Atomic Energy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the use of the two atomic bombs on August 6 and 9, 1945, over the two industrial cities of Japan, Hiroshima and Nagasaki, brought to the realization of the people of the world the fact that a new and terrible type of warfare was possible. A destructive element had been brought into play which was a thousandfold greater than any previous element used in warfare between nations. During the year which followed, thoughtful men became greatly concerned with the question of how this great force could be controlled. It was obvious that two phases of control would be necessary; first, control on the domestic plane in each nation; and second international control which to be effective, would, of necessity, require the cooperation and participation of every nation in the world which possessed industrial facilities and scientific knowledge. When the Seventy-ninth Congress convened on September 5, just 1 day after the formal surrender of the Japanese, a bill was presented in the House and in the Senate to establish methods of atomic control and procedure on the domestic level. This bill, H. R. 4566, commonly called the May-Johnson bill, was referred to the House Committee on Military Affairs, of which I was a member. Only perfunctory hearings were held, lasting a total of 3 or 4 days. With the exception of two scientists, Dr. Leo Szilard and Dr. Harold Anderson, both physicists who had important duties to perform in the development of the bomb, the balance of the witnesses were proponents of the bill. The bill was reported favorably out of committee despite the protests of the gentleman from Illinois, Congressman MELVIN PRICE, and myself. The gentleman from Illinois, Congressman PRICE, and I prepared the dissenting report which was filed against the bill. The May-Johnson bill languished in the Rules Committee until the following June 1946. At that time S. 1717 was passed. It set up a special committee for the proper consideration of this important subject. Extensive hearings were held extending over a period of 8 months. The most important scientists, industrialists, educational and civic leaders in the United States were given ample opportunity to discuss all phases of the complicated legislation. As a result of this very proper handling of this important legislative matter, a bill was reported unanimously.

It is interesting to note that among the provisions which were not contained in the May-Johnson bill, but were included in S. 1717, were principles which Congressman PRICE and I had recommended in our dissenting report some 8 months previous. These principles were: First, the Commission should be composed of full time, well-paid members; second, the Administrator should be a civilian; and, third, the Government should be the exclusive producer and owner of plutonium and other fissionable materials. Senate bill 1717 was finally passed by both Houses and signed by the President and is now the law which establishes our policy in regard to domestic use of atomic energy. Pursuant to the conditions contained in this bill, the President appointed a five-man civilian Commission. These men are outstanding Americans. They have outstanding qualifications. I submit here a list of their names:

Summer T. Pike, businessman and broker, formerly of Stone and Webster in Boston and with Wall Street's Pomeroy & Co., having more lately served as Republican member of the Securities and Exchange Commission until he resigned a year ago.

William W. Waymack, editor of the Republican Des Moines Register and Tribune, and member of the board of directors of the Chicago Federal Reserve Bank.

Lewis L. Strauss, who rose to rear admiral in the Naval Reserve and who was a partner in Kuhn, Loeb & Co., bankers.

Robert F. Bacher, physicist, formerly head of Nuclear Research at Cornell University and one of the natural scientists who assembled the first atomic bomb, and David E. Lilienthal, former Administrative Director of TVA.

Mr. Lilienthal was appointed Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. The Commission was appointed on November 1, 1946. During the past 4 months, it has been busily engaged in acquainting itself with its duties and in formulating plans to comply with the legislation which Congress passed, Senate bill 1717.

It was assumed that the President's appointments would be approved without great delay in view of the fact that such outstanding personnel had been selected by the President and in view of the great urgency presented to the people of the United States by the discovery of atomic energy, and the necessity of further research and development of this great discovery. On June 1, the Army, which had been in charge of all atomic energy control, relinquished its jurisdiction of the great Manhattan project to this Commission. Since January 1, 1947, therefore, the Atomic Energy Commission, although not formally approved, has been in actual charge of this $2,500,000,000 nationally owned project. They have had access to all the secret facilities and information regarding this project.

They have had the responsibility of management of this great project and of maintaining security of information regarding the atomic bomb. The delay in approval has been a serious detriment to the American people. It has been impossible for the Commission to proceed with long-range plans for development, for contracts, for research, for location of uranium deposits, and experiments in peacetime adaptation of atomic energy. An effort has been made on the part of the Commission to keep the machine running. This effort has been partially successful, but it has been far from achieving the results which would have been achieved had the Commission been established promptly by approval as required by law.

The chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy Legislation invited the House Members to attend the hearings in order that they might be acquainted with the testimony and the procedure adopted. At this point I want to pay a very sincere compliment to the chairman and the members of the committee. The hearings have been conducted with fairness and impartiality by the chairman. The chairman has exercised unusual patience in permitting one of his colleagues to participate at great length in the cross-examining of witnesses. The long-standing feud against the former Chairman of the TVA, Mr. Lilienthal, is too well known to the Members of Congress to be the occasion of elaboration. Suffice it to say that the cross-examination of Mr. Lilienthal has been lengthy and tiresome to many of the listeners. The witnesses called to testify in opposition to Mr. Lilienthal have been lacking in ability to impress the members of the committee, the press correspondents, and the general public. They have been, in most instances, mediocre and lacking in background of national importance. Their testimony has not been convincing. On the other hand, some of the most important industrialists, scientists, religious, and business leaders of the United States have appeared in favor of Mr. Lilienthal.

I submit here a list of witnesses testifying in support of Mr. Lilienthal's confirmation, and also witnesses testifying against his confirmation, which was printed in the March 3 issue of the Washington Post:

Probably one of the most regrettable parts of the Atomic Energy Commission hearings has been the attempt to prove that Mr. Lilienthal is a Communist. The custom of smearing people of good character with charges of "communism," "Red fascism," and "radical," and the attempt to include within the opprobrium of these epithets, "progressive," "liberal," "New Dealer," is in my opinion, one of the most dangerous practices in contemporary American politics. It is a tactic which was used in the 1946 campaign with some success by Republican candidates for national office. But temporary political success obtained by "red baiting" and "red smearing" people of progressive, social, economic, and political beliefs, with rabble-rousing epithets, will pale into insignificance alongside the danger to democracy inherent in these practices. "Red baiting" and "red smearing" charges against progressive-thinking people who believe in solving the social and economic problems of our democracy by constitutional means and by constitutional evolution, are dangerous. The reason they are dangerous is because they seek to discredit the proponents of progress by an epithet which prejudices the minds of unthinking or easily swayed persons. It seeks to accomplish an end by appealing to hysteria rather than by the exercise of reason and logic. This was the method used by Hitler to defeat his opposition during the days when the Nazi Party was rising to power in Germany. The people who opposed Hitler were labeled "Communist" regardless of whether the charge was true or not. By labeling his opponents with the group charge of "communism," he discredited and destroyed the democratic elements in the German Nation. His theory, as explained in Mein Kampf, was to tell a colossal lie and repeat it often enough until the people believed the lie to be the truth. This is the technique of Himmler and Goebbels. It is the propaganda base upon which nazism and fascism were built. It is a peculiarly dangerous type of character assassination, when used by a Member of the United States Congress under the conditions of immunity from libel which a Representative or a Senator possesses. The charge of "communism" when hurled from a congressional committee seat or a legislative rostrum, should be made only when actual proof of such affiliation is concurrently presented. The custom of some Members of the Congress in grouping sincere and honest people who differ with them in regard to the method of how to solve social and economic problems with Communists, is a dangerous procedure. Not only is it dangerous but it is a cowardly method of character assassination against which the private individual has little or no recourse. Such charges, once printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, even though unfounded and unproven, can be referred to, quoted, and reprinted for the remainder of the individual's life by his personal or political enemies.

The charges of communism against Mr. Lilienthal were unfounded and were not proven by the testimony presented to the Atomic Energy Committee. After days of harassment and persecution, which Mr. Lilienthal submitted to in a patient manner, he finally, after an unusually vicious attack upon his patriotism, burst forth with an impromptu, but most impressive, exposition of his belief in democracy and its meaning to him. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include at this point a portion of Mr. Lilienthal's remarks on this subject. In my opinion, this credo of democracy which was voiced by Mr. Lilienthal is destined to go down in history as one of the great patriotic expressions of our time. When questioned as to his political philosophy, Mr. Lilienthal said:

I will do my best to make it clear. My convictions are not so much concerned with what I am against as what I am for; and that excludes a lot of things automatically.

Traditionally, democracy has been an affirmative doctrine rather than merely a negative one.

I believe—and I conceive the Constitution of the United States to rest upon, as does religion—the fundamental proposition of the integrity of the individual; and that all Government and all private institutions must be designed to promote and protect and defend the integrity and the dignity of the individual; that that is the essential meaning of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, as it is essentially the meaning of religion.

Any form of government, therefore, and any other institutions which make men means rather than ends, which exalt the state or any other institutions above the importance of men, which place arbitrary power over men as a fundamental tenet of government are contrary to that conception, and, therefore, I am deeply opposed to them.

The communistic philosophy as well as the communistic form of government fall within this category, for their fundamental tenet is quite to the contrary. The fundamental tenet of communism is that the state is an end in itself, and that therefore the powers which the state exercises over the individual are without any ethical standards to limit them.

That I deeply disbelieve.

It is very easy simply to say that one is not a Communist. And, of course, if my record requires me to state that very affirmatively, then it is a great disappointment to me.

It is very easy to talk about being against communism. It is equally important to believe those things which provide a satisfying and effective alternative. Democracy is that satisfying, affirmative alternative.

Its hope in the world is that it is an affirmative belief, rather than being simply a belief against something else and nothing more.

One of the tenets of democracy that grows out of this central core of a belief that the individual comes first, that all men are the children of God, and that their personalities are therefore sacred, carries with it a great belief in civil liberties and their protection, and a repugnance to anyone who would steal from a human being that which is most precious to him—his good name—either by imputing things to him by innuendo or by insinuation. And it is especially an unhappy circumstance that occasionally that is done in the name of democracy. This, I think, can tear our country apart and destroy it if we carry it further.

I deeply believe in the capacity of democracy to surmount any trials that may lie ahead, provided only that we practice it in our daily lives.

And among the things we must practice is that while we seek fervently to ferret out the subversive and antidemocratic forces in the country, we do not at the same time, by hysteria, by resort to innuendo, and smears, and other unfortunate tactics, besmirch the very cause that we believe in, and cause a separation among our people—cause one group and one individual to hate another, based on mere attacks, mere unsubstantiated attacks upon their loyalty.

I want also to add that part of my conviction is based on my training as an Anglo-American common-law lawyer. It is the very basis and the great heritage of the English people to this country, which we have maintained, that we insist on the strictest rules of credibility of witnesses and on the avoidance of hearsay, and that gossip shall be excluded, in the courts of justice. And that, too, is an essential of our democracy.

Whether by administrative agencies acting arbitrarily against business organizations, or whether by investigating activities of legislative branches, whenever these principles fail—these principles of the protection of an individual and his good name against besmirchment by gossip, hearsay, and the statements of witnesses who are not subject to cross-examination—then, too, we have failed in carrying forward our ideals in respect to democracy.

That I deeply believe.

The pin-drop silence which had obtained throughout Lilienthal's remarks lasted several moments more.

Then a quiet voice said, "That was the statement of a very real American."

The Atomic Energy Committee approved today, by a vote of 8 to 1, the appointment of Mr. Lilienthal and the other members of the Atomic Energy Commission. Senate bill 1717 provides that "members of the Commission shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." That consent is now pending. It is sincerely hoped that such consent will not be further delayed and that the opposition to Mr. Lilienthal will withdraw so that our great atomic-energy project can function freely.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I ask that at this time certain basic facts regarding atomic energy, as compiled by the National Committee on Atomic Energy, be included in my remarks:

ATOMIC ENERGY HAS OPENED A NEW ERA FOR MANKIND

The prehistoric man who first lit a fire opened a new era. But he never imagined a blast furnace.

When James Watt discovered the power of steam he started something which transformed the ways of men. But he never imagined the Queen Elizabeth.

Even wise old Benjamin Franklin, who experimented with electricity, had no idea this force would light cities and bring one voice to a million homes.

We likewise cannot imagine how atomic energy can change our ways and our world. What it may mean to you is sketched below.

New power, harnessed by man, means greater freedom. Your car brings you greater freedom. Splitting the atom gives us power so enormous it is hard to comprehend. For instance, the atomic energy in 1 pound of uranium is as great as the energy we obtain when we burn 1,300 tons of coal.

Such power can be used for either good or evil. It can either create or destroy.

The best minds agree that atomic warfare can destroy our kind of civilization. It might not destroy all civilization. As Dr. Einstein has suggested, enough intelligent people might be left to rebuild painfully and slowly. But, after such a catastrophe, it would not be the civilization we know now. And most of us would not live to see it.

One central fact about atomic energy is this: as soon as you start making it upon a significant scale you have the materials used for atomic bombs. As Mr. Baruch has pointed out, when you produce these materials you have gone 75 percent of the way to producing a bomb.

THE ATOMIC BOMB IS THE MOST DEVASTATING WEAPON EVER POSSESSED BY MAN

What happened at Hiroshima showed that one atomic bomb can kill 100,000 people. If a bomb were set off to inflict casualties instead of damage, its radiations could kill more than its blast. The more crowded the target area, the more would be killed The United States delegation to the Atomic Energy Commission estimates the destruction of the bomb as equal to that of 167 10-ton block busters. Its power is equal to 20,000 tons of TNT.

These figures mean that atomic bombs, despite their cost, are very cheap weapons in relation to the destruction they can do. As far as the vital heart of any city is concerned, one bomb can liquidate one city.

Future atomic bombs will become even more destructive as their efficiency is developed.

A few years from now it will be possible to send atomic bombs across oceans in rockets. Looking ahead, Dr. J. R. Oppenheimer has estimated that 40,000,000 Americans might be killed in one atomic attack.

THERE IS NO MILITARY DEFENSE AGAINST THE BOMB

Up to now, a means of defense has been created to meet every new offensive weapon. This has happened in the case of the rifle, the machine gun, the modern naval gun, the torpedo, the tank, and the bomber. But the defense was never complete. Each of these weapons killed many thousands in the war. Ask anyone who has been in an air raid.

Defensive measures finally stopped 90 percent of the V-1 flying bombs shot at London. But even then 10 percent got through. If they had carried atomic bombs, London would have disappeared. Even this very high degree of success in defense could not save a city from atomic destruction.

But the V-1's were unusually easy to stop. Defensive measures were not, on the average, nearly as successful against bombers. They had no success against the V-2 rocket.

They are not likely to be very successful against transoceanic rockets armed with atomic warheads. Like the V-2 these rockets might drop from the stratosphere at any place at any time at thousands of miles an hour. We cannot expect to perfect a defense which would stop even 90 percent. As the war showed again and again, actual experience with new weapons is required before effective defense measures can be improvised.

In this case the defense problem of stopping even one rocket appears exceedingly difficult, because the rocket would fall twice as fast as an antiaircraft shell goes up, and with only seconds or minutes warning of its approach. Defensive crews could not remain fully alerted year after year.

Defense would also be necessary against other forms of atomic attack, including sabotage. For example, atomic bombs could be brought into the country in small parts and secretely assembled in our cities. Or bombs could be secreted in merchant ships and blown up in our ports. It is hard to imagine a 100-percent defense against these methods of attack.

Foremost military authorities believe the principal military defenses against atomic attack would be (1) dispersion of our cities and industries and (2) all-out preparedness to counterattack. The cost of the first has been estimated at $300,000,000,000. It would decrease the casualties and destruction from an attack. But it must be remembered that an enemy could, at a fraction of this cost, increase greatly the power of the attack.

The second would tend to make an enemy fear to attack us. It might force him to use many of his bombs against military installations. But it would not help the people in cities which were attacked.

THE UNITED STATES IS HIGHLY VULNERABLE TO ATOMIC WARFARE

Most Americans live in cities. One-third of our people live in 199 cities of over 50,000 population.

We have the largest industrial plant in the world, highly concentrated in one section of the country.

For these reasons, experts say, we are more vulnerable to atomic attack than any other major country except England. We are likely to remain highly vulnerable. Quite apart from the staggering costs and economic losses involved, dispersing our cities and industries or moving our more vital industries underground would require many years and would have only limited value.

This vulnerability is increased by our institutions and our form of government. Due to our freedoms and our habit of freedom, effective protection against atomic sabotage would be particularly difficult. Our Constitution provides that Congress must declare war. Our traditions and ethical standards would go far to preclude delegating power to the President to launch an attack upon a probable enemy before he actually struck at us.

THERE IS NO SECRET—ONLY A TEMPORARY MONOPOLY

The talk about keeping the secret has been phony from the start. All nations have the knowledge of the basic scientific facts of atomic energy which we had in 1941.

They also know vitally important things that we did not know then—that atomic fission is possible; that plutonium can be produced from U238; and that U235 can be separated successfully by four different processes.

What the secret really comprises now is primarily the engineering know-how. Some of this comes from actually doing the job. The rest comes from the high technical standards of our industry. Many other countries are now able to learn what is left of the secret by doing the job themselves.

We still have a monopoly of actual atomic production and bomb manufacturing. But that monopoly can be only temporary.

OTHER COUNTRIES CAN PRODUCE ATOMIC BOMBS

The necessary raw material, uranium, is scattered widely over the world. If the demand is sufficient, rich deposits are not necessary. Thorium, which can be used with uranium, is even more widely distributed.

In terms of destruction atomic bombs are cheap weapons. Their manufacture, although highly technical, does not require a huge plant or outlay. Production of atomic materials need not cost other countries anything like the $2,000,000,000 it cost us. Instead, they can concentrate on one process, for instance the plutonium process, which cost us only three hundred and fifty millions. We did that job regardless of cost under war conditions. They might do it much cheaper.

Authorities believe that any highly industrialized country, whether large or small, can make atomic bombs in a number of years if it is prepared to make the financial and economic effort. How long it would take would depend upon that effort plus industrial capacity and skills. Most estimates run between 3 and 10 years from last winter. It would be unwise to count on our present monopoly of atomic bombs lasting as much as 5 years from now.

Other nations may have bomb stock piles in perhaps 5 years. Actually the time involved might be less, only 4 or 3, if we fail to establish effective international control of atomic energy. Once stock piles of bombs had been started in other countries, they would grow steadily.

Such pyramiding stock piles of atomic bombs would breed the greatest fear mankind has ever known. This would be most extreme among the populations of cities, perhaps causing periodic panics. Every time international friction developed, the barometer of fear would rise.

One result would be large-scale movement out of cities. This would dislocate economic life and real-estate values. Indeed, such widespread fear might paralyze the normal workings of Government and undermine our democratic way of life. We all remember the restrictions imposed by Government controls during the war. Far more extensive Government controls would seem necessary in that kind of a peace.

Past experience shows that armament races lead toward war. An atomic armament race plus such a spread of fear and mass hysteria would lead toward, and could set off, an atomic war.

WORLD CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY CAN END THE MENACE OF ATOMIC WAR

Although there is no effective military defense against the atomic bomb now and there is none in sight, there can be another kind of defense. That is a political defense. It can be achieved by setting up world control of atomic energy.

If no nation has atomic weapons, surprise atomic attack will be impossible.

The fear and danger of atomic war would then be reduced to a minimum. For effective world control of atomic energy would minimize the possibility of atomic war. Atomic attack would then become possible only if the control system broke down, allowing some nation to make atomic weapons.

WORLD CONTROL IS PRACTICABLE

The Acheson-Lilienthal Report set forth six essentials which, if fulfilled, would make a world-control system work. They were, in summary:

1. The plan must reduce the control problem to manageable proportions.

2. It must provide clear and reliable danger signals of any violations which might lead toward atomic war.

3. It must provide security if it works, yet must leave any nation such as the United States relatively secure if it breaks down.

4. It must not be wholly negative and police-like, but must be constructive, promoting the beneficial uses of atomic energy.

5. It must provide for meeting new dangers if they arise.

6. It must involve international action, and minimize international rivalry, in atomic development.

THE UNITED NATIONS IS SEEKING WORLD CONTROL

The United Nations Atomic Energy Commission, comprising the 11 nations on the Security Council and Canada, is now trying to establish world control of atomic energy.

This Commission was set up by the United Nations General Assembly, following earlier agreements between the United States, Britain, Canada, and Russia that world control was necessary. It met on June 14, 1946. Upon its success depends the future of mankind.

At the first meeting the American representative, Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, submitted comprehensive proposals for world control. These were based upon the Acheson-Lilienthal Report.

The central feature of these proposals was the creation by treaty of an international Atomic Development Authority. To this body would be entrusted all phases of the development and use of atomic energy.

The Authority would have either managerial control or ownership of all atomic activities which are potentially dangerous to security. It would also have power to control, license, and inspect all other atomic activities.

At a stage to be determined in the atomic treaty, the United States would stop manufacturing atomic bombs and dispose of all its existing bombs. Our temporary monopoly of atomic energy would then be transformed into a permanent monopoly of the Authority.

On September 26 the scientific advisers of the Commission adopted unanimously a report on the scientific and technical aspects of the problem of control. It concluded that world control was technologically feasible. While it did not recommend any particular system of control, it underlined the complexity of control. To this extent, it gave support to the American plans.

The Commission made its first report to the Security Council on December 30, adopted by 10 votes with Russia and Poland abstaining. Completing the first phase of the Commission's work, this report outlined its progress to date and submitted findings and recommendations.

The recommendations followed closely an American draft with some additions and changes. They included the following points:

There should be a strong and comprehensive international system of control and inspection set up by a treaty.

The treaty should establish an international Authority with power to carry out its duties and able to operate without any great power veto.

The Authority should be responsible for preventing the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes and for its control to the extent necessary to insure its use only for peaceful purposes.

It should have positive research and development responsibilities in order to remain in the forefront of atomic knowledge and should have power to make decisions governing national atomic energy agencies.

The treaty should also provide for free access for the Authority's representatives; for disposal of all existing stocks of bombs; and should prohibit manufacture, possession and use of atomic weapons.

There should be no legal right, by veto or otherwise, whereby a willful violator of the treaty would be protected from punishment.

The treaty should embrace the entire program of putting the international control system into effect, including a schedule of stages for transition to international control.

It must be remembered, however, that general acceptance of the basic principles of the atomic treaty will be only a first step in the creation of effective control.

ATOMIC ENERGY MUST BE MAN'S SERVANT, NOT HIS MASTER

Once atomic energy has been brought under effective world control, it will become a means of prosperity and progress instead of a source of fear. It will bring peoples together, instead of forcing them apart and underground.

Already we have a glimpse of how atomic energy can serve us, once we are free to use it.

Atomic power can open up rich regions of the earth which lack either coal or waterpower. A few pounds of plutonium can be carried thousands of miles at negligible cost. For example, large areas in the interior of Brazil are rich in mineral resources but have no railroads. Plutonium could be transported to those regions by air.

Too much shielding is required to permit use of atomic power in automobiles. But it may be used to drive ships, or perhaps even giant rockets able to travel through space.

Atomic energy can improve health and prolong life. Already radio-active substances have been used to treat diseases. Large quantities will become available for health and research. Radioactive tracers can be followed inside the human body and bring us new knowledge of how it works.

Such tracers can also expand our knowleige of biology and industrial processes. They can mean to biology what the microscope has meant to science. We may even learn how plants obtain energy from sunlight, the basic process of life on our planet, and become able to employ this process mechanically.

Among other expected benefits of atomic energy are improvement and increase of many kinds of food, until a day arrives when no man need starve.

But many experts believe that the greatest boon of all will be the increase in knowledge through research. Scientific knowledge generates progress in all directions, leading to developments never imagined at first. Here is a new key to progress, comparable in significance to fire. It can open wide a door for the advancement of mankind.

We stand now at the threshold of a new world of tomorrow, a world of which this generation can see only the outlines.

Whether we shall have such a world depends upon what happens now, in the next 2 or 3 years. It depends upon whether or not we bring atomic energy under effective control.

EACH OF US HAS A PERSONAL STAKE IN WORLD CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY

The success or failure of the effort to establish such control will affect decisively the life of every human being.

For instance, if you are a businessman, it will affect you vitally.

World control of atomic energy will open new fields for business. It will bring new confidence in the future. It will promote new industrial techniques and products and new technological progress, favorable, in greater or less degree, to every industry.

But if, instead, we have an atomic armaments race, fear of the future might paralyze business operations. Armament costs and Government restrictions would impose a crushing burden on private enterprise. Real-estate values and many other property values would fall, as thousands deserted cities in the hope of greater safety. You might even give up your business to look for some job in the country.

If you are a worker you will be equally affected.

World control of atomic energy can mean more jobs and rising standards of living. It can bring shorter hours and better conditions of labor.

But if we have an atomic armament race, more and more of the available jobs would be concerned with national defense, many of them on installations which would be first targets for atomic attacks. Others would require working underground. The hard-won rights of labor would be likely to suffer under the overpowering urge of our people for a maximum of protection at any cost.

Whatever your profession and wherever you live, the success or failure of the effort to achieve world control of atomic energy will shape your life. For all men it will decide whether or not they must live in fear, as their cavemen ancestors did 10,000 years ago. For hundreds of millions it will probably decide between annihilation or survival.

We cannot turn back the clock to the pre-atomic era. Only one thing could end the Atomic Age now that it has begun. That is an obliteration of world civilization so extensive that men could no longer split the atom.

The principal nations of mankind are faced with a choice between progress and destruction. The time is now.

YOU CAN DO YOUR PART

If you understand the facts about the atomic problem yourself, you can help your friends to understand them. Whenever the subject comes up in conversation, you can spread accurate information.

If you are a member of an organization, club, church, school, labor union, or office staff, you can promote discussion and study of the atomic problem. Study groups, discussion groups or meetings with speakers, slides or films can disseminate knowledge of the atomic facts. By getting together, organizations can put on more effective programs.

If you know the facts, you can also help to check the spread of inaccurate statements. You can write a letter to the editor of a newspaper, or call a radio station when inaccuracies occur, and you can challenge errors in discussion.

Since our country is a democracy, sound action by Congress must rest upon informed public opinion. Our Government will have to act upon many crucial issues in the atomic field, including any treaty establishing world control. If you know the facts, you can do your part to ensure that our Government acts wisely.

THE SCHOOL-LUNCH PROGRAM

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the President will promptly submit to the Congress, and that the Committee on Appropriations will immediately approve, a request for funds to carry on the school-lunch program for the remainder of the fiscal year. I am advised that $10,000,000 will be adequate and that early action by the President and the Congress is required in order to avoid the closing down of this program in at least 16 States.

I can understand the hesitation on the part of the President to request and by the Appropriations Committee to approve deficiency appropriations, but I believe the situation justifies and demands such action in this instance. At the time the regular appropriation of $75,000,000 was made last June it was thought by all of us that such sum would be ample to support the program until July 1 of this year. Our calculations were based upon the amount of participation in the program at that time. But there was a 12-percent increase in the number of schools and children qualifying for the program, and this has brought about the same percent in the shortage of funds.

I shall not attempt here to enumerate the many advantages of the school-lunch program or the great benefits the children of the Nation derive from the program. These are demonstrated by the expansion and growing popularity of the program. But I do remind the Members that we decided to place the program on a permanent basis at the last session of the Congress because we had become convinced that it had proven to be a valuable contribution in building sound bodies and minds for our children and offered a sound outlet for surplus agricultural commodities when these surpluses begin to appear in the future.

It was my privilege to aid in the drafting of the legislation at the last session to put this program on a permanent basis. This was handled by the Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member. I later served on the conference committee of the House and Senate, and our final recommendation is now Public Law 396, Seventy-ninth Congress, second session, entitled "An act to provide assistance to the States in the establishment, maintenance, operation, and expansion of school-lunch programs."

I call your special attention to the word "expansion" as clearly indicating that the Congress expected the program to expand and intended that more schools and more children should qualify under the program. Such natural and anticipated expansion has brought about the present shortage of funds and justifies the President and the Congress in making additional funds available immediately.

I should also like to call your attention to the formal declaration of the policy of the Congress with respect to this program. It is section 2 of the act, as follows:

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress, as a measure of national security, to safeguard the health and well-being of the Nation's children and to encourage the domestic consumption of nutritious agricultural commodities and other food, by assisting the States, through grants in aid and other means, in providing an adequate supply of foods and other facilities for the establishment, maintenance, operation, and expansion of nonprofit school-lunch programs.

Then section 3 authorizes the appropriation of such funds "as may be necessary" to carry out the provisions of the act. The appropriation of an additional $10,000,000 at this time is most necessary to carry on the program until June 30, and, of course, the regular appropriation of an adequate sum to continue the program during the next fiscal year beginning July 1 is of equal importance and necessity.

As an indication of the deep interest of the people of my own State in this program, I call your attention to the following resolution unanimously adopted February 26 by the Georgia State Senate:

Senate Resolution 24

Whereas in initiating, supporting, and maintaining the national school-lunch program, the Government of the United States has rendered invaluable aid to the cause of public education, from which the common-school system of Georgia has enjoyed its full participation since this wise legislation was originally fostered and the benefits thereof first became available to the pupils in our public schools; and

Whereas it is essential to the realization of Georgia's ambitious plans for the full development of its educational program and the adequate instruction of the children of our State that these Federal grants which were so auspiciously launched and so successfully maintained during recent years, whereby nourishing food at lunch time may be available to the growing generation of America's future citizens, shall continue without interruption; and

Whereas in the movement for retrenchment in national expenditures now so widely advocated, there is grave danger that this essential service shall be placed in jeopardy or sacrificed to the serious detriment of our educational interests: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Georgia (the house of representatives concurring), That we hereby memorialize and urgently bespeak the favorable consideration of the Congress of the United States of suitable appropriations that will insure the continuance and maintenance of the national school-lunch program upon substantially the same basis which has heretofore represented such an important contribution to the institution of public education as it has come to be recognized among the paramount obligations assumed by the Public Treasury; be it further

Resolved, That copies hereof be transmitted at once to the Members of Georgia's delegation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

Read and unanimously adopted February 26, 1947.

WM. T. DEAN,
President pro tempore and Presiding Officer.
MRS. HENRY W. NEVIN,
Secretary of the Senate.

And in the same connection I read you an article appearing in a recent issue of the Dawson News, published in my old home town and edited by Hon. Carl Rountree, one of the outstanding newspapermen of my State:

SCHOOL-LUNCH PROGRAM IS ENDANGERED AS CONGRESS CONSIDERS ECONOMY MOVES

Federal aid for Georgia's school-lunch program is in danger of being scuttled by what is termed an economy move in Congress. This kind of economy will affect 274,387 who are now receiving lunches in 1,437 schools. If Federal aid is cut off April 1 most schools will find it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to continue operating this program that has meant so much to boys and girls all over the State.

A bill has been introduced calling for additional funds to carry out provisions of the National School Lunch Act for 1947. The bill has been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and supporters of school lunches hope to get it passed. But some Members of Congress are unsympathetic toward the program and indicate they do not want Federal aid continued after its expiration date April 1. Federal money for equipment is not affected, however.

For the fiscal year 1946–47 Georgia was allotted $1,855,159.95 for the program and a supplement of $290,360.01 was approved, making a total Federal allocation of $2,145,-519.26. The Federal Government supplies 43 percent of the total cost of operating the State-wide program. The other 57 percent comes from lunch money collected from the children by the schools.

School lunches have been a great factor in improving the health of Georgia school children. Education officials say that students repeating grades have been greatly reduced and they think the right kind of diet for growing youngsters has much to do with this condition. At present there is at least one school lunchroom in every county in the State.

Dr. M. D. Collins, State superintendent of schools, says he is optimistic that the necessary Federal money will be provided because almost every State is similarly affected. He has written Georgia's Senators and Congressmen urging them to support legislation for continuing the Federal grants.

What will happen if the Federal money is cut off? Miss Eleanor Pryor, State director of the lunchroom program, says some schools might be able to continue serving lunches by increasing the price paid by the child for his meal. However, approximately 12 percent of the lunches served are free because children are not able to purchase them. There is also the possibility that local clubs and civic organizations might come to the rescue of some schools.

But the fact remains that most schools would be seriously handicapped and the program that has become so popular would suffer a definite recession.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein a newspaper article and a resolution by the State senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LARCADE, for 1 week, on account of official business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 11, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou Father of all mercies, whose spirit mingles with ours as sunshine with the air, we wait at the altar of supplication, deeply conscious that we are the children of time and sense. In the shadow of Thy wings, love and truth go before Thy face. We rejoice that Thou art our help and strength, and pray Thee to make us restless and weary of the things we see, striving for that which transcends human attainment.

As we meditate on the world's desperate condition, attend unto our spirits, O Lord, lest our thralldom be tragically complete. O clarify our vision, gird us for labor, and grant that in all honor we may measure up to the demands of an expectant public. Forbid that we should lose their respect by vacillation or by compromising our traditions. Hear our humble prayer, O Lord, for Thy name's sake, and grant us Thy peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and to include a newspaper article and an editorial.

Mr. KILBURN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution on the St. Lawrence seaway.

STRIKES AND VIOLENCE

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, during the past 5 weeks the Committee on Education and Labor has been holding hearings in an effort to find as adequate a solution as possible to labor unrest. We have heard unbelievable testimony concerning violence in the conduct of strikes throughout the Nation. Workers have been beaten up, their families and homes molested, in practically every large city in the Nation. It is the same pattern, whether in Detroit, Chicago, or New York. In Pittsburgh we heard evidence that explosive bombs have been hurled at business establishments and fires started. Witnesses from Philadelphia came before the committee and testified that they were afraid of their lives because they testified before the Committee on Labor. This situation is not confined to large cities. As an example, and there are many similar cases, there is the case of violence involved at the Norman Dairies in New Canaan, Conn., a community of 6,500 population. The drivers of two trucks owned by this small dairy were beaten up and left unconscious by the roadside. One of them, incidentally, was a returned veteran of the Navy Air Corps. These victims had the courage to swear out warrants against their assailants, and, although that was 14 months ago, the case still has to come to trial.

Only last Saturday a representative of the AFL carpenters' union who is involved in the 2-year-old jurisdictional strike in the movie industry in Hollywood testified that he felt his life was in danger from the very moment he left our committee room.

About 2 weeks ago, George P. McNear, Jr., appeared before our committee to testify relative to the strike on the Toledo, Peoria & Western Railroad. After he testified, he indicated to me personally that he felt he might be threatened and that attempts might be made to intimidate him. Later, representatives of the unions involved in that strike also testified before this committee.

They charged Mr. McNear, among other things, with lack of any knowledge of railroading and, at least by intimation and inference, impugned his patriotism. To these charges Mr. McNear did not see fit to reply.

He could have stated that he learned railroading under Mr. Loree, famed American railroader. He could have stated that he worked on track gangs on the New York Central in 1916 and early 1917 in order to fit himself for an important post in organizing French railroads in World War I.

And as to his patriotism, he could have told the story of his only son in World War II. That son, in the Navy, wrote to his father in the fall of 1944 that he had his orders to return to the States.

But—

Said young McNear—

I have been given special training to fit me for a big job that is coming up. I feel I should stay here and see it through. What do you think, dad?

And his father wrote back:

Son, you don't desert the boat in the middle of the stream; you see it through to the far shore.

Young McNear voluntarily "saw it through." Today he lies buried in New Guinea.

Today his father lies dead in Peoria, victim of an assassin's bullet fired from a speeding automobile as the elder McNear took his nightly walk near his home.

He did not desert the boat in the middle of the stream, but chose to try and see it through to the far shore.

It would seem that this instance, plus the bombings in Pittsburgh, plus the shootings in Hollywood, plus innumerable like incidents growing out of labor wars in this country puts the question squarely to the Eightieth Congress of the Republic of the United States.

Will this Congress desert the boat in the middle of the stream or, regardless of how strong the personal dangers involved, see the boat through to the far shore of industrial peace in this country.

I believe we have a duty to do more than legislate. As chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor, I am asking the Attorney General of the United States to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation to go into the McNear slaying immediately and with all the facilities that great agency has at its disposal. In my opinion, there is a direct connection between the slaying of Mr. McNear and his testimony before our committee. It is significant that only yesterday I received a letter from Mr. McNear in which he stated:

I would be glad to return to Washington for further questioning regarding my additional statement, if the committee should so desire.

Mr. Speaker, we want and we will do everything in our power to correct situations such as this. However, this tragedy, which culminates a series of reports of violence throughout the Nation, is the primary responsibility of the local law-enforcement agents throughout the Nation. I rise to ask the question: What has happened to law and order in this Nation? When are our governors, our county sheriffs, our local officials, our local police departments going to display the intestinal fortitude to adequately deal with these situations?

It is high time that all of those entrusted with the enforcement of law and order wake up to their responsibility and make it clear that no individual or no group, however powerful, is immune from the laws of the land.

R. 1943, a bill to establish a permanent Nurse Corps of the Army and the Navy and to establish a Women's Medical Specialist Corps in the Army, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

SUSPENDING CERTAIN IMPORT TAXES ON COPPER

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 140, Rept. No. 119), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2404) to suspend certain import taxes on copper. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committe on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same back to the House with such amendments as shall have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

DECLARATION OF RECESS

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow it may be in order for the Speaker to declare a recess at any time during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

GREAT BRITAIN SHOULD NOT BE A MEMBER OF THE COMMITTEE ON PALESTINE, AS SUGGESTED BY SECRETARY GENERAL TRYGVE LIE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, Trygve Lie, Secretary General of the United Nations, has suggested the appointment of an advisory committee to study the Palestine situation and to submit recommendations to a regular or special meeting of the General Assembly. Mr. Lie has been sounding out the Big Five.

The United States has properly refused consent on the ground that Great Britain has not submitted a clear-cut proposal on Palestine.

The United States must also object to the inclusion of Great Britain as a member of such committee. Mr. Lie has stated categorically that this committee will be composed of the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, France, and China, which are the permanent members of the Security Council, together with Brazil, Czechoslovakia, and Sweden.

The inclusion of Great Britain would be a grave mistake. She is a party in interest and if included she would be acting as a judge in her own cause. Great Britain must be excluded. Common decency and justice require it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JACKSON of Washington asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter and a resolution adopted by the Washington Congress of Parents and Teachers.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include in one a newspaper article appearing in the Boston Post and in the other an editorial that appeared in the Irish World.

Mr. MUNDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Daily Argus-Leader.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was given permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a sermon. I am informed by the Public Printer that this will exceed two pages of the RECORD and will cost $159.75. I ask that it be printed notwithstanding that fact.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

SOCIAL SECURITY FOR ALL

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the present Social Security Act is a worthy step toward providing some measure of financial independence and peace of mind for the men and women who made this country, as they reach that well-earned period of rest from their labors that we call "the sunset of life."

Perhaps we delayed too long in passing such legislation, and that is the reason why the present law is unbalanced, extending coverage to some, while denying it to others.

No one of us, with the tragic memories of boom-and-bust still in his mind, can rest content until he makes every effort to protect all of our people from any possibility that they may have to endure such a ravaging experience again.

We must have full employment, but more than that, we must establish a bedrock of security for those who, because of their age, are cast aside by our economic system.

To be truly democratic, we must have no bewildering and heart-breaking poverty for the aged in this rich land of ours.

Social security for all on a self-sustaining basis can be won by support of the bill which I have introduced. It will provide benefits on a minimum-maximum range of $60 to $75 per month for every retired citizen 60 years of age and over. The revenue to support this law will come from a tax of 2 percent upon the gross dollar value of all business transactions conducted for profit within the United States. For the purposes of this act, wages, salaries, and commissions shall be considered as transactions.

We have recently emerged from a war which was a struggle, in part, between the "have" and the "have-not" nations. Apart from humanitarian considerations, let us soberly ask ourselves, "Can we afford to let this situation develop within our Nation?"

Industry itself has come to realize that its production and its profits are dependent upon the widest possible distribution of purchasing power.

The aged, too, are consumers. They, also, must have the wherewith to buy, when they are no longer wanted in the labor force.

Social security for all will strengthen our national security.

LEGISLATION TO CORRECT INEQUITIES IN PUBLIC LAW 134

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, by inadvertence when Public Law 134 was passed by the Congress, the three lower salary employees of the postal service were deprived of the benefits of the meritorious grades provided in that act.

I am certain it was not the intent of Congress to discriminate against these low-salaried employees. For that reason, I conclude it was an oversight that they were omitted from the provisions and benefits of Public Law 134, as amended.

The classes of postal employees to which I refer are: Elevator mechanics helpers, telephone operators, firemen and firemen's helpers, gardeners, guards, elevator operators, window cleaners, charworkers, messengers, and manual laborers; a total of some 13,000 employees throughout the entire postal service.

To rectify this apparent discrimination against these lower salaried employees in our postal service, I am introducing a bill to amend Public Law 134, approved July 6, 1945, so as to give these employees the benefits of the meritorious grades, thus giving them equal consideration with other postal employees.

I am informed this bill has the approval of the Post Office Department and the Bureau of the Budget. The bill will not affect the 1947–48 budget, inasmuch as its effective date will be July 1, 1949.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding the fact that the House may be in session on subsequent days during the week a subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments which is investigating racketeering may be permitted to hold hearings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is that for today?

Mr. HOFFMAN. For Thursday and Friday.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know what will be under consideration in the House on Thursday and Friday, Mr. Speaker. I announced the other day that when bills were being considered under the 5-minute rule I thought committees should not sit. Until we determine what will be the program on Thursday and Friday, I must object.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How about Friday?

Mr. RAYBURN. I said Thursday and Friday. We can wait and see, I think.

COMMUNISM IN THE GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, at least some of us Members of the Congress are getting tired of seeing and hearing the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] rise on this floor and attack Great Britain, a friendly country, for resisting what we consider a Communist-front movement in Palestine known as the Zionist movement.

Now we are being asked to challenge Communism in Greece. I for one have been in favor of challenging communism in this country all the time; but I want to begin at home and drive communism out of every department of this Government first.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARTLEY] complained a while ago of Communists threatening the witnesses that come before his committee, and told of one of those witnesses being murdered last night. I say, bring out your bill and let us pass some legislation to put a stop to these outrages.

Another thing, I should like to wake up the Department of Justice. I am for cleaning house and fumigating every department of this Government. The Committee on Un-American Activities wrote letters to the Department of Justice 2 weeks ago for information that we needed and to this date we have not even received a reply.

Mr. Speaker, we are coming to a great show-down with atheistic communism throughout the world; but while we are cleaning the other fellow's house let us clean our own and drive these subversive elements from every branch of our Government, from our educational institutions, from labor unions, and from every other phase of American life. Let us save America for Americans. This is the last stand of civilization as we know it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I have been receiving a number of letters and telegrams—and I know some of the other Members of the House have also—with respect to the fact that Congress is slow in passing legislation. They mention particularly the matter of labor.

We of the Committee on Education and Labor have been working hard for 5 weeks from morning until night, sometimes from 9 in the morning to 7 o'clock at night, to give everyone a fair hearing, including both labor and management. During that time, while the Communist end has crept into our hearings, we find that the difficulties seem to rise mainly in the question of jurisdictional strikes. They appear to be paralyzing our Nation. We ask the people of the United States and the Congress, both the House and Senate, to give us a little time, because we are going to bring out a bill very shortly. When we do, I think that you will find that it will be fair to both management and labor.

THE FOREIGN SITUATION

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, on March 22, 1941, a New York Times editorial carried this sentence:

> If China is to be saved, with our help, from Japanese and Axis control its embattled leaders will have to forget their divergent doctrinal objectives and settle their present dispute peaceably.

That was six long years ago. Since then billions of dollars of American money and the blood of American youths have been poured into Asia in an effort to "save China."

Now the same people who maneuvered America into ghastly failure in China are at it again. They want us to go into Greece in the same fashion. What are these schemes for? The Communists could not figure out a surer way to destroy America than the road the internationalists have taken us on for 6 years—with Greece now proposed as the next milepost. Our bewildered leaders, whose policies have resulted in such complete failure, now play into Stalin's hands when they are sucked into overextending our declining strength around the world.

TAKING CARE OF THE OLD FOLKS

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I know, and all of us know, that many important matters are going to confront us during this session of the Congress. But I hope we do not forget our old folks.

I have recently introduced a bill, H. R. 2410. I hope I shall have the opportunity to call its provisions to your attention a little later. It is simple. I believe it is workable. But whether my bill is passed or whether some other bill is passed, definitely, gentlemen, definitely we must take a step forward to protect and provide for our own old folks. It is a tragedy the way it has been going. It is all mixed up and a jumbled-up affair. It is not just. It is not simple. It is not American. I hope we will give our attention to it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio address.

THE FOREIGN SITUATION

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I am asking for this opportunity to correct several serious misstatements which are being spread throughout the country. The Republican Party is being charged with all the difficulties through which our country is passing.

Let us call a spade a spade. The major European problems which afflict us today are the direct products of the secret agreements secretly arrived at during the war. For reasons unknown to the American people and even to those in the State Department who should have known, European spheres of influence were carved out at the major conferences of Russia, Great Britain, and our country. Russia was given control over the whole of central and western Europe. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, and the Balkans were read out of western Europe. Our own country was to be content with its usual idealistic goose egg.

The chickens are now coming home to roost. We shall pay and pay heavily for the next generation for this foreign policy. But let the country know and let it know in unmistakable terms that this legacy is our heritage from the Democratic Party.

We Republicans are simply resuming our historic role. Here at home and overseas, we are pulling the Democratic chestnuts out of the international and national fires.

STRONG ARMY AND NAVY

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, the same elements in this House who were responsible for the unpreparedness of the country, who failed to give full support to the United States foreign policy, and who would today emasculate the Army and the Navy are the ones who are crying, "Get rough with Russia," and complaining about the actions of the State Department.

The American people know it is impossible to get tough with Russia or any other foreign nation and have a strong, vigorous diplomatic policy unless we have a large Army and a large Navy. Those eastern European nations fear nothing but force, and there can be no diplomatic success unless the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle insist that we have a strong Army and Navy to back up our State Department.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE] has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial in which is contained a poem written by James Patrick McGovern.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an article from the American Legion Bulletin about this so-called AVC and this man Carlson, this slimy little Communist, who is writing books about America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1947—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 1968) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will opportunity be afforded for discussion of the conference report before the previous question is put?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, this conference report carries some emergency items, that is, items that are necessary to meet the pay rolls of the different units of the Government and some of the obligations of the Veterans' Administration. The Veterans' Administration still has not been finished up and we will need further hearings to cover what is necessary on other items a little later.

With the exception of certain items relating to the Senate, items to which attention will be called later, the items in the bill relate to the OPA. Here we have agreed with the Senate upon an item of $7,051,752, which is the exact amount they claim is required for the terminal leave to which the OPA employees will be entitled.

We have reduced the cut in the rescission end of the bill from $9,000,000 to $2,000,000, and in that we have made available to the OPA a very considerable sum of money, a sum of money which will unquestionably, if they have honest administration—which they have not had so far—give them plenty of money with which to operate needed activities. They have a pay roll in Washington of 914 people drawing upward of $4,000, and to perform their functions they need no more than a hundred. They have 850 drawing under $4,000, and they need no more than a hundred. Out in the field they have an enormous number still left on law enforcement with nothing left except cases which should have been disposed of long, long ago or should have been turned over to the Department of Justice. You understand that these people do not try the cases. The cases, if any, are tried by the Department of Justice. These people would be able to maintain at least 5,000 people on the pay roll with what money we left, in my opinion, which is far more than they need to do a good job.

There is no question in my opinion but what this outfit should be wound up, but there is very serious question that the language goes far enough to actually accomplish that end. I hope it does. There is a provision on page 6 of the bill that it is the intent of Congress that the funds heretofore and herein appropriated shall include all expenses incident to the closing and liquidation of the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Temporary Controls by June 30, 1947.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have been extraordinarily liberal in providing funds for this agency. When they finished up their work, with the exception of sugar rationing, rent control, and one or two other small items, about the 7th of November, they had upward of 30,000 employees. They did not keep faith with the Congress and get rid of them promptly, as they should have, but kept most of them on until the 1st of December before giving them terminal notice. Then they spent a very large sum of money in December, and they have spent enormous sums since that time. For instance, they had on their rolls a week or two ago 122 economists in their Washington office, 147 accountants, 187 analysts, 168 attorneys, and an enormous number of other officers drawing large salaries. They had 64 people with an average salary of about $8,000 a year acting as a committee to obtain employment for the employees, with nothing else to do. They had a very large sum of money set up for a historical project with an enormous number of people working and doing a lot of other things on a much more elaborate scale than they could possibly be entitled to. These people I have listed had no substantial job on their hands that they needed to do. There is no question but what if they had managed the thing honestly they could have performed every single function that is up to them to perform.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Amendment No. 20, to which both the House and Senate agreed, specifically provides for the entire liquidation of the Office of Price Control on or before June 30; is that correct?

Mr. TABER. I wish it did, but I am afraid it does not.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. It says so specifically in the report the gentleman filed.

Mr. TABER. It does not. I read it to the gentleman, and if he had been listening he would have known that that is not correct.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I have before me the printed language and may I call it to the gentleman's attention? It is printed in the RECORD, at page 1910. Amendment No. 20 "rescinds $2,000,000 of Office of Price Administration funds instead of $9,000,000 as proposed by the House and none as proposed by the Senate, with the proviso that the Office of Price Administration shall be entirely liquidated not later than June 30, 1947."

Mr. TABER. That is right. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That means the end of rent control unless other legislation is enacted by this Congress; is that not correct?

Mr. TABER. Well, the Office of Price Administration and its controls would expire at that time unless there was other legislation.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I know, but the report provides for the liquidation of that office in its entirety.

Mr. TABER. Yes, that is right.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That means, incidentally, also, that the remaining funds not rescinded here are for liquidating purposes, and primarily for liquidating purposes.

Mr. TABER. Certainly, they are partly for liquidating purposes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And that means liquidating the enforcement of rent control.

Mr. TABER. They have been getting it. The people can enforce their own rent control by the triple damage provision, in part, and they can do it much more effectively than it has been done, and they do not need these people who have done nothing but mess up the situation further.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am not arguing with the gentleman as to the merits of continuing rent control. That is something on which we disagree. I am a firm believer in rent control. What I am trying to get agreement on from the gentleman is the effect of that amendment No. 20, which has been agreed to by both the House and the Senate conferees.

Mr. TABER. The effect of it is this——

Mr. MARCANTONIO. May I complete my statement, please? In view of the language calling for liquidation in its entirety, the gentleman must necessarily agree that that also calls for the liquidation of rent control.

Mr. TABER. Only if the Congress does not pass an act extending it, because rent control is not dependent on the continuance of the OPA. It is dependent upon the statute. There is no statute that runs beyond that time. The effect of this language is this, that it would require these people to take care of their terminal leave and their cleaning-up activities by the 30th of June. If the Congress desires to change the law and extend rent control after that date, that would be a matter for consideration at that time as to whether any further appropriations or funds should be made available for any governmental agency to continue to operate their functions.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the conferees on this side of the aisle have signed this report with considerable doubt and some reluctance. But there is so much that is carried in the bill that is necessary and essential that it overshadows the questionable provisions to the extent that we are going along. We go, however, with reservations contingent upon assurances of the prompt enactment of legislation to provide for continuation of essential services discontinued in the pending bill.

Perhaps the principal item of interest in the bill is the precipitous liquidation of OPA. Before discussing the merits of the proposition, it may be noted in passing, Mr. Speaker, that this liquidation is effected through a legislative rider. I think there was no evil in our legislative machinery which was so decried and so castigated in the months of debate on the reorganization bill as the practice of legislating through riders on appropriation bills. By common consent it was branded as reprehensible, as the last resort of parliamentary depravity, and one of the outstanding provisions of the bill, one of the salient arguments in favor of the passage of the streamlined Reorganization Act in the House, was that its enactment would eliminate, once and for all, this unholy practice of legislating on appropriation bills.

The Reorganization Act was duly passed and is now in force, and yet we have here in the pending conference report provision for a drastic change in our economic machinery, to be effected through a rider on an appropriation bill. Thus the far-famed and highly publicized reorganization bill is, as usual, being honored in the breach through total disregard of one of its most cherished provisions.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. On yesterday we were discussing the bill providing funds for rural free delivery. I pointed out that the Post Office Department was complaining that although these extensions in the various communities throughout the country are being approved they do not have the funds to provide the service. Last night I took this proposition up with the Post Office Department and was informed that this proposition did not apply to the next fiscal year, but it is a deficiency appropriation that is needed now. May I ask the gentleman if there is anything provided in this bill to take care of those extensions of rural free delivery routes throughout the country, and if not, I should like to know what the prospects are for an additional deficiency bill. Can the gentleman give me that information or can the gentleman from New York answer the question?

Mr. TABER. There is nothing with reference to the Post Office Department that I remember of in this bill.

Mr. RANKIN. May I ask the gentleman from New York when he contemplates bringing out another deficiency bill?

Mr. TABER. There are items under hearing at the present time. The bill probably will be marked up either late this week or the first of next week. I cannot tell yet about that.

Mr. RANKIN. What I mentioned then, I will say to the gentleman from New York, is the fact that large numbers of rural free delivery routes have been extended, probably in almost every State of the Union, but they need a deficiency appropriation in order to put those extensions into effect. It seems to me that while we are taking care of everybody from Tokyo to Timbuktu we might look out for our farmers and see that those boys who were drafted into the service to fight the battle of the world at least are provided with mail service, along with other American citizens.

Mr. TABER. May I say to the gentleman that my attention was not called to that prior tc this time, nor has the Post Office Department told me that that condition existed. But just as quickly as the committee is able, I will be glad to have hearings and I will notify the gentleman and give him an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], as well as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. There has been a great deal of interest in the school-lunch program. Of course, the budget recommendation is not before the committee as yet, but, as I understand, unless there is a deficiency appropriation, the program for the present fiscal year will expire on March 31. Would the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] advise me whether or not he favors a deficiency appropriation to continue this program until June 30?

Mr. TABER. The understanding was when the bill was passed and the appropriation provided that that would be all of the Federal contribution for the fiscal year. Personally, I do not think the Federal Government is in as good a position to pay for these lunches as the State governments and the municipalities. Therefore, I feel the State governments and municipalities should carry the burden. That is my personal position. I do not mean by that that if the bill should be passed increasing the authorization and the budget estimate come up that I would not afford the people interested a hearing.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words the gentleman himself is opposed to the program?

Mr. TABER. I feel that it is a responsibility that can be met much more cheaply by the localities and that they are much better able to bear the burden than the Federal Government is at this time.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words, the gentleman himself is opposed to the program?

Mr. TABER. I am, personally.

Mr. McCORMACK. I understand that of the $75,000,000 appropriated, which I think was the amount, $10,000,000 was for the purchase of equipment which, of course, we provided for in the authorization bill which passed the House last year. I understand that $10,000,000 will probably carry the program until the end of June. I honestly disagree with my friend. I think the program serves a very useful purpose. The States are cooperating. Every State had to make their contribution, and certainly the contribution of some States is much more than that of the Federal Government.

Of course, the school-lunch program has been a means or source of invaluable assistance to our farmers, particularly with reference to moving their surplus crops.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, supplementing what has been said with reference to the school-lunch program, it is to be regretted that provision is not being made for a deficiency appropriation to continue the program for the remainder of the fiscal year. At the time of the establishment of this program, the assurance was given, or at least implied that the Federal Government, having initiated the service, would continue its support. Of course, all of us realize that if left to the States, or local units, neither is in position to provide all the funds needed for the complete administration of the program. The only hope of its maintenance is the continuance of Federal cooperation as heretofore. For us to abandon it at this critical time is not only to leave the impression that we are withdrawing assurance by the Federal Government and accepted by the States. But the abandoned program also leaves a large amount of equipment and specially designed and adapted facilities which has been provided in schools distributed throughout the country which cannot be utilized and which—unless it can be used in the school-lunch program—must necessarily be wasted.

Mr. Speaker, we are making large appropriations at this time for livestock. International cooperation for control of foot-and-mouth disease and hog cholera are being amply financed. Surely we can do something for the greatest crop in America, the children—in seeing that they are protected from a recurrence of conditions which, during the war, resulted in the rejection of a large percentage of our young men, due to anemia and undernourishment in their childhood years.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. I subscribe to the fine sentiments which the gentleman has just indicated with reference to the school-lunch program. I think the Congress has, at least to some extent, encouraged the States to overspend. In the past when they have overspent we have made up the deficiency as we did last year. I understand we appropriated $15,000,000 additional last year to make up the deficit. So I say we have encouraged the States to overspend in some respects, and I think we should continue this program.

Mr. CANNON. There has been a tacit understanding that, having initiated this program, the Federal Government would continue it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK. I agree with the gentleman heartily in the statement he has made. When I supported the move for eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease, as I did, I did not do that with the idea that I would block a better effort which we have heretofore put forth for the children of America.

Mr. CANNON. There is no reason why we should not take care of the health of both the livestock and the children.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. FOLGER. I wish to bring to the attention of the gentleman the fact that the cost of living to the school children has increased as it has to other people.

This has overtaken this school-lunch program, making it true that they will have to abandon it in this month unless the Federal Government supplements its former appropriations. It is a condition that has been brought about. The facilities may be used to carry it on, but it will be only for those who are able to pay for their lunches, and the others will get none. That is the situation.

Mr. CANNON. Experience has demonstrated that even the children from the wealthiest homes have shown immediate improvement in physique and in scholarship as a result of this program. I trust the Committee on Appropriations will relent and agree to continue the program as heretofore.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact, as has been stated, that due to the increased cost of living, especially the cost of milk that goes into these school lunches, has brought about a situation where there is not sufficient funds for the program to be continued? Can the gentleman tell me who is responsible for the increased cost and for the shortage that now exists?

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I do not know whether this is a private conversation or whether the rest of the House is involved in what is being said or not. I cannot hear what is being said. It seems to me we should know.

Mr. SABATH. I am pleased that the gentleman is interested in what I started to say and I hope he will take an interest in what I shall say.

Is it not true that destruction of OPA by the Republican party has brought about a 50-percent increase in the cost of living in only 6 months, and has increased the burden of the cost of school lunches to a point where the States and municipalities cannot carry it alone?

We must make some provision for these children.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], has offered criticism because I have continuously drawn attention to the sharp increase in living costs, and especially of food items, especially the rapid spiral since the November elections.

Nevertheless, he must admit that the school-lunch program was originally created to help the farmers. There were vast surpluses in danger of rotting in the granaries, and the people did not have the money to buy them. The school-lunch program was designed by a Democratic administration to bring the cash from the cities and the crops of the farmers together, and help agriculture. Now farm prices are at the highest point in all history, and farmers for the first time are getting 120 percent of parity for their produce, and the plight of poor children who need the noontime lunches at reduced prices—not charity—is no concern of the gentlemen from the rich and prospering farm areas.

To deny this appropriation so desperately needed to continue the school-lunch program is indeed false economy, as is the elimination of appropriations for rent and sugar controls. We shall pay for this in the future.

Mr. CANNON. The sharp increase in cost of living immediately following curtailment of the activities of OPA demonstrates the truth of what the gentleman says.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to discuss amendment No. 20 and its implications. This amendment, in my opinion, definitely destroys rent control. It eliminates it. It calls for the liquidation of OPA in its entirety on or before June 30, 1947. There is no argument about that. The Division of Rent Control exists in OPA, which will be liquidated in its entirety under this amendment. It means the end of rent control. Now, you cannot come here and say that Congress may enact rent-control legislation later on and for that reason we must therefore provide for the liquidation of the Rent Control Division now. That is not the language of the friends of rent control; that is the language of the enemies of rent control. I think it is lamentable—and I do not mean this in personal criticism of my good friend from Missouri—I think it is lamentable that the Members of the minority party signed this report which knifes to pieces the program for rent control as we have had it heretofore.

Mr. CANNON. Our agreement to this conference report, of course, was on the premise that immediate legislation would be drafted and enacted to preserve the essential benefits both of the rationing of sugar and the maintenance of the rent-control program.

I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I should like to ask this question of the gentleman from Missouri and I would ask it also of the Members of the other side of the House: I inserted in the RECORD of March 6 a telegram and a letter from the Governor of the State of Oklahoma pointing out that unless we have a deficiency appropriation for the school-lunch program affecting 180,000 school children in Oklahoma alone that it is going to die on March 31. I wish to ask this question of the Republican side of the House: Under the mandate that you talk about of last November 5, did you get a mandate to stop the school-lunch program in this Nation? Of course you did not.

Now, let us find out one other thing. I have never been too strong for deficiency appropriations in the main, but in a program like this where you are buying food and other commodities which have risen in cost since October of 1946, though no fault of the people who have to purchase this food, I am going to ask you this one question—I will address it to the gentleman from New York: Is the gentleman's party willing to accept the responsibility for killing a program such as this?

Mr. TABER. Seventy-five million dollars was all that the Democratic party dared pass last June and go to the country on.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will ask the gentleman whether he will support a deficiency appropriation now to carry on the school-lunch program for the rest of the fiscal year?

Mr. TABER. Have not the gentleman's people back home sufficient confidence in the school-lunch program to carry it on themselves and meet their own responsibility?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The State of Oklahoma, and the other States as well, are meeting their proportionate share. That I take is a complete answer. The gentleman's position is that he is not willing to carry it on. I want the people of this Nation and the people back in Oklahoma to know that this is the way the gentleman's party is carrying out the mandate that was given them last fall. I do not believe the gentleman's party got any mandate to kill such a program as this.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I might say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has frankly admitted his opposition to this program. Knowing the gentleman as I do I make this observation, that we Democrats can be proud of the fact that we put it into the law. The Republicans are going to destroy it.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I want to endorse the remarks of my friend and colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON], with reference to the school-lunch program. I know that I came here under a mandate from the people of my part of Oklahoma to continue this very important project.

Furthermore, while on this subject of deficiency appropriations, I want to urge that the next deficiency bill provide sufficient funds to carry on our Indian schools, hospitals, and other services at their present levels.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I have always supported the school-lunch program. I feel from personal observation it has been very helpful to many of the school children of Texas. I would regret very much to see this program handicapped. For 3 years I taught in rural schools and at times I have observed children who did not have proper food at noontime. I think this is unfortunate with reference to any child anytime and should not be tolerated. The school-lunch program takes care of such a situation. The program should not be discontinued or handicapped in any way.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the protection of the public against inflation in the price of the necessities of life, in time of war, is fundamental. And that is particularly true of rents—and to only slightly lesser degree in the distribution of such staples as sugar. We are advised by those in a position to know that but for the control and rationing of sugar during the war years the price would have risen to something like 70 cents per pound, and the channels of supplies so monopolized by confectioners, distillers, soft-drink processors, and other large industrial users that the average housewife would have been entirely deprived of sugar most of the time. Due to devastation of sugar-producing areas in the Philippines, the East Indies, and other sugar-manufacturing centers the recovery of the industry has been delayed so that the world supply is still tragically short. In order to insure each family having its proportional supply it has been necessary to continue rationing, and will be necessary to continue rationing in the future, until normal supplies are available.

Likewise, war conditions require the control of rents in order to avoid intolerable conditions which would otherwise skyrocket housing costs to a figure which would so seriously hamper the mobilization of labor in industrial centers as to threaten the success of the war program. Due to lack of construction of the normal increase in housing during the war, rent control also is necessary in the reconversion period pending resumption of construction and the provision of necessary housing throughout the Nation.

The bill now before the House liquidates all OPA control of both rents and foods, including sugar, by June 30, 1947. This means discontinuation of enforcement as of April 30. It is true that proponents of this summary conclusion of OPA activities insist that sufficient funds have been provided to continue enforcement to June 30. But the facts are otherwise. Here is a comment in this morning's Washington Daily News:

> Your Government reporter learns—
> That OPA, after several weeks of indecision while Congress debated its appropriation bill, now is making definite plans to fold up by April 30.

This is an authoritative report on actual conditions. It leaves us in the analogous position of having a rent-control law on the statute books until June 30 but no administrative agency and no means of enforcement after April 30. Unless prompt steps are taken to provide for the hiatus, we will be without rationing and control through May and June.

It was only on the assurance that legislation is already being drafted to continue the rationing of sugar through the Department of Agriculture and the control of rents through the Department of Commerce, or other competent agency, that we have signed the conference report and are supporting this bill.

It is to be hoped that there will be no unnecessary delay in the enactment of this emergency legislation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York give me 5 minutes to complete my presentation?

Mr. TABER. I have not very much time left and I have other commitments. I am sorry. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, the field day which has been indulged in over the question of the school-lunch program is indicative of what we may expect during the rest of the legislative year. I was here when the school-lunch program was inaugurated. The plea of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from Illinois, and the gentleman from Missouri—the latter being the great economy-minded gentleman of the Congress—then was, that we were confronted with agricultural surpluses and one of the splendid ways to get rid of those agricultural surpluses was to have the school children of America eat them up. That was the justification for the program when it started. Now, with that beginning it has grown into a permanent program of some stature. There were $75,000,000 appropriated last year to carry on this program that the gentleman from Oklahoma went into such ecstasies about. As a matter of fact, I may say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that in my State we had a school-lunch program long before the New Deal was ever thought of. I do not suppose you ever had that sort of an idea down in Oklahoma and some of these other States. However, the States of this Union and the municipalities that comprise those States are fully able to maintain and to finance a school-lunch program. They have the equipment now that can be used, and it will be used.

What you are in effect saying is that the States of this Union, which as a whole make up these United States, will not carry on this great magnanimous, magnificent program which you gentlemen say is going to keep the children of this Nation alive. They are going to let it die. The only way you can keep it alive, according to them, is for the Federal Government to step in and finance it and send the charge back to the same States with a clip-off at the Federal end of it for handling the transaction.

My friend from Missouri should not play both sides of the street. We either ought to stand for a program of economy or we ought to stand for the program that has so long represented the New Deal—a spending program. Either we are going to get on to this economy program or we are not. It will not do for the gentleman from Missouri or some one else to stand up here and talk economy one day out of one side of his mouth and the next day stand up here and preach for this program or that program which means another very large sum of money which the States and the municipalities are perfectly able to take care of themselves. May I say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the question facing the people of this country is simply this: Are we going to put back into the hands of the States and the people of the States the responsibility that is theirs?

Mr. Speaker, I sometimes wonder how I ever grew up. I wonder how I ever got this stature. I lived in a period when we did not have the school-lunch program. I wonder how I ever got through it. I wonder how you people who are out there ever got to grow up at all without somebody spoon-feeding you out of the Federal Treasury. It seems to me it is time we begin to get back to certain fundamentals and have the Government do the things that the Government ought to do here in Washington and let the local people do the things they ought to do and that they are equipped and are able to do and in most good communities want to do, may I say.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. May I make the observation that the gentleman did a pretty good job in growing up. He must have got plenty of lunches.

Mr. KEEFE. I got plenty of lunches and, may I add, we went out and did some work for some of those lunches. We knew how to work. The trouble is today nobody wants to work; everybody wants to have everything handed to him. It is a great thing to stand up here and raise your voice and picture the poor little children who are starving. The gentleman from Illinois stands up here and tells us that the prices are going up due to OPA being taken off, when he knows as well as I know, and so does the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Massachusetts know as well as I know, that you have the Commodity Credit Corporation representing the United States Government in every market in this Nation bidding the price of wheat up, competing against the miller, bidding the price of wheat up to $2.75 a bushel in order that we might carry out our commitments to feed the entire world.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman four additional minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. And, as long as that situation continues, and as long as a nation that for 25 years has never been able to completely feed itself and has been on a food-importing basis, as long as that nation attempts to feed the people of the world, you may expect that with Uncle Sam in the market places competing with the millers and private producers, that prices are going to rise. They are going to get higher; make no mistake about it.

This is a pretty critical situation that is facing this country, and you will be sobered up tomorrow when our President makes his speech from this rostrum. You will not be treating this so facetiously and laughing about it, as some of you are doing now. It is pretty serious business, and no one knows it better than the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Missouri, who attended the President's conference up at the White House. This is not anything to laugh about, and I want to tell the gentleman from Illinois that it does him no credit to try to throw every one of these discussions into a pure political discussion.

The salvation of our country is not a political question, and you gentlemen are going to have a hard time to join hands with us to save this country, and you know it, and yet on every one of these bills that come out here you make a field day of political discussion, injecting a lot of silly politics in it in order to accuse the Republicans of doing something bad.

Now, I will tell you what you are going to have to do. You are going to have to assume your responsibility in this world picture or not assume it, and if you do, prices are going to continue to rise, and the gentleman from Illinois or anybody else like him ought to tell the people of America the truth. These rising prices are not to be related to OPA. They are rising because America is attempting to feed the world out of a stock that never was designed for such purposes, and your Commodity Credit Corporation is in the market places bidding against local millers and local producers for that diminishing supply of goods.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. TABER. I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to call the attention of my distinguished——

Mr. KEEFE. "The admiral from Wisconsin," as the gentleman called him one day.

Mr. CANNON. My distinguished and able and trusted friend from Wisconsin. He speaks of the President as "my" President. I trust he means "our" President.

Mr. KEEFE. I mean he is my President, and I so stated. He is going to come here tomorrow and tell you the truth, and you had better get ready for it, instead of standing up here and carrying on these piddling politics while the country is collapsing around our ears and while the whole world threatens to collapse. I am sick of it as far as I am concerned. We had better get along with our business instead of having these little piddling arguments while the whole world burns and is looking for action.

Mr. CANNON. There are 10 minutes remaining of the hour. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield me 5 minutes of the 10.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to draw the attention of my colleagues to the critical necessity for continuing adequate rent-control administration and Federal rent control until June 30, 1948. This job must be carried on effectively, now, until there is new legislation turning it over to an agency other than OPA. A break-down at this time will incur consequences of the utmost gravity to my constituents and to millions of other Americans. After World War I rents shot up 50 to 75 percent and evictions multiplied, because there were no controls. With the cost of living now over 60 percent higher than in 1939, the people of moderate income cannot stand the strain. It would be felt in a galloping inflation and in labor strife.

Mr. Speaker, as far as housing is concerned, the war is still on. We may be reducing here several million dollars for OPA over what the Senate provided, but I do not believe that my constituents can afford that kind of economy. This is a regrettable conclusion for me as there are other provisions of this report which I favor very much.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and two Members are present, not a quorum.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 342, nays 49, not voting 41, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection?

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1948

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2436) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2436, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on yesterday the first paragraph of the bill had been read.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries: For personal services in the District of Columbia, including the operating force of the Treasury Building, the Treasury Annex, the Liberty Loan Building, the Auditors' Building, and the west and south annexes thereof, $650,000.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, on yesterday while the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY] was speaking, I interrupted him to ask about the funds for the extension of rural mail routes. I told him it was my understanding that a large number of these extensions had been provided and that no funds were available to put those extensions into operation.

After the Congress adjourned I got in touch with the Post Office Department and was informed that those shortages could not be covered by this bill, because this is the appropriation measure for the fiscal year 1948, and funds must be provided in a deficiency bill if these short extensions in the various sections of the country are to be made.

I make this statement because of the fact that the debate on yesterday would leave the impression that these deficiencies could be taken care of by amendment to the present bill. But that is not the case. These funds must be provided, if they are to be provided at all, in a deficiency bill.

I call this proposition to the attention of the Members to clear the record on that point.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Does the gentleman mean the funds for the period from now until June 30 of this year?

Mr. RANKIN. That is right

Mr. EBERHARTER. How about the regular funds for the fiscal year 1948? Are they provided for in this bill?

Mr. RANKIN. They told me they thought the funds provided in the present bill would be sufficient for the next fiscal year. If not, a deficiency bill could be brought in in the next session.

But all over this country, in every agricultural section, extensions of rural mail routes have been provided. They have been surveyed and approved, but the Department does not have the money to put them into operation.

So I just want to serve notice now that when the next deficiency bill comes before the House the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has promised me an opportunity to appear before the committee in favor of an item to take care of those extensions. My position has been, as you all know, that if we provide mail for one man, we should provide it for all. It is my contention that we should extend a mail route and a rural power line to every farmhouse in America. I will make only this limitation: I will say to every house that can be found by the tax gatherer in times of peace or that can be reached by the draft in time of war.

There is no reason for us to pinch pennies on rural mail routes and on rural electrification and then spend the billions of dollars that America is called upon to contribute to other sections of the world.

Nothing that I can think of will do more to strengthen this country than to provide mail service and electric power service to every farm home in this country.

I shall continue my efforts toward the attainment of that end.

The Clerk read as follows:

Refunding internal-revenue collections: For refuding internal-revenue collections, as provided by law, including the payment of claims for the prior fiscal years and payment of accounts arising under "Allowance or drawback (Internal Revenue)," "Redemption of stamps (Internal Revenue)," "Refunding legacy taxes, act of March 30, 1928," "Repayment of taxes on distilled spirits destroyed by casualty," and "Refunds and payments of processing and related taxes," $1,231,000,000: Provided, That a report shall be made to Congress by internal-revenue districts and alphabetically arranged of all disbursements hereunder in excess of $500 as required by section 3 of the act of May 29, 1928 (sec. 3776, I. R. C.), including the names of all persons and corporations to whom such payments are made, together with the amount paid to each.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GORE: On page 12, in line 20, strike out "$1,231,000,000" and insert "There is hereby appropriated such amount as may be necessary for prompt payment of tax refunds."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, withholding taxes are now being withheld from the pay rolls of 55,000,000 American citizens. Those taxes are being withheld not at the rates which some future tax bill may fix. Those taxes are being withheld at the rate of the present tax law.

The principal reason which the committee assigns for its guess that there will be less claim for tax refunds can be found on page 16 of the committee report. Please understand I am not endeavoring to criticize the members of the committee. They have undoubtedly done a conscientious job, and they worked hard. Nevertheless, it behooves the Members of the House to examine any innovation, to examine any guess, to determine for themselves the rightness of the course. I would like to read to you at least one of the reasons they give. They say: "Coupled with the expectation of several million less taxpayers filing as a result of prospective changes in the tax laws, it is felt that the reduced figure would more nearly approximate the amount required."

Let us see how that operates. There are 55,000,000 taxpayers from whom withholding taxes are now being withheld. If we cut 20 percent of them off what is the result? We do not decrease the number of claimants for tax refunds, we increase it. As a matter of fact, 30,500,000 taxpayers in the last fiscal year filed claims for refund; so we cannot escape the conclusion that the reasoning and the logic behind this statement is inaccurate. The very opposite will be the effect.

Through my amendment I am offering to put into the bill the language which has been in the bill since the enactment of the withholding tax law. Originally the Appropriations Committee and the House wrote into appropriation bills specific amounts for tax refunds, but with the enactment of the withholding tax the claims became so large that it became an impractical procedure.

If we place this specific appropriation in the bill it not only serves as an appropriation but it operates as a limitation: The Treasury of the United States cannot make tax refunds in an amount larger than this figure which is $800,000,000 below that which the Bureau of Internal Revenue estimates the tax refunds will be for the next fiscal year. Unless, therefore, the Congress passes another appropriation bill, a deficiency appropriation bill, sometime before the end of the fiscal year, we will tie the hands of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and prevent them from making prompt tax refunds to people who are entitled to them. With what result? The millions of small income taxpayers who have overpaid will not get prompt refunds of the money which they need, and the second result will be that we will just prolong the period during which 6-percent interest will have to be paid on these refunds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, instead of being content to examine the language of the report my good friend from Tennessee should have busied himself a little with the actual testimony that was taken on this item. I believe that would make it quite clear.

There was estimated for tax refunds in the President's budget $2,031,000,000 for the fiscal year 1948. The committee, after taking testimony from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, from the Chairman of the Excess Profits Tax Council, from Dr. Atkeson, who is one of the fiscal experts in the Treasury Department, and from the Alcohol Tax Unit, finally concluded that this amount could be very safely diminished on the basis of their own testimony. When I queried Dr. Atkeson I asked, "How did you arrive at this amount of $2,031,000,000?" Then he began to give me figures and set forth the arithmetic for the estimate. I said, "Doctor, I do not want to know about arithmetic, I want to know what the theory is behind it." And when we got all through—you will find his answer on page 496 of the hearings—he said, "It is the best guess that we can make."

Now that is the Treasury Department speaking. When Mr. Hamel, chairman of the Excess Profits Tax Council, who has been a practicing tax attorney for 25 years and once served as a member of the Board of Tax Appeals, came before the committee it was the same thing. He said, "It is the best guess we can make." But there was another answer to it that was highly intriguing. We finally discovered, and you will find it in the hearings, when all is said and done the Treasury did not even make the guess. The guess was made by the Bureau of the Budget which is not only a fiscal arm, but in a sense one of the political arms of the Presidency. I said, "Perhaps our guess is as good as yours." He said, "Perhaps so."

Now then, it was not a guess after all. First, you will find that in this total item as disclosed on page 568 of the hearings you take off $123,000,000. Treasury officers testified that if the excise-tax bill went through there were $123,000,000 in this estimate that ought to be deducted. That is not the gentleman from Illinois, EVERETT DIRKSEN talking to you, that is the Treasury Department testifying before the committee. With respect to excess-profits refunds, I said to Mr. Hamel: "I suppose you get frivolous cases where people simply file and later on you discover there is no foundation to the case." He said, "Many of them." He said, "I did some missionary work in the country." You will find it recorded on pages 548 and 549 of the hearings. He said, "A great many cases have been withdrawn and one-half of all the cases have been disposed of." Since June of last year they allowed $42,000,000 in refunds on excess profits and they have asked for $420,000,000 in this bill for fiscal 1948.

There is a little something wrong with this kind of arithmetic. It becomes the responsibility of the subcommittee, having some knowledge of arithmetic, to come to certain conclusions. Budget officials have reached up and made a fine guess. Our friend from Tennessee proposes to make this an indefinite appropriation like it was and to leave it an open-ended amount. If you will examine the language of the bill you will discover that we made it a definite appropriation. We want them to come back and tell us at the end of this year or the beginning of the next fiscal year what they have done with the money.

I believe that the Congress, which has the power of the purse under the Constitution, is entitled to know what happens to money that goes out of the Treasury of the United States. Yet only one copy on refunds is filed with the Ways and Means Committee and I am frank to say to you we have not had a look at a single refund case to find out whether it was justified or not. So we made it a definite appropriation. We take their own figures, we take their own statement that there is going to be a diminution in the case load here, and I think we have treated them with great generosity in taking out only $800,000,000.

It has been said that this is a phoney item. That word "phoney" was bandied about on this floor in committee yesterday. There was also talk about legislative duplicity. Let me say to you that the President of the United States carries all this in the expenditure budget for the fiscal year 1948. When we deal with a ceiling we are dealing with a ceiling on expenditures. So we are only taking the bookkeeping of the Government of the United States and adapting our processes and techniques accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I am wondering in connection with this estimate that the committee made. Suppose the money runs out, say in 8 months of the fiscal year 1948. May I ask whether the subcommittee would consider a deficiency appropriation bill so that these taxpayers who are entitled to refund of this money can get it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. A subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee has no choice in the matter because deficiency estimates are prepared by the budget Bureau. They are approved by the President. They can send us a roomful of deficiencies and we cannot stop them. The only question is whether or not we propose to enact the deficiency after we have taken further testimony. It would be a grand idea, after some experiences under this item as set up by the subcommittee, if they would come back and tell us the whole story. Now, we are proposing that that be done because we said in the report that through the power of legislative oversight of the subcommittee we propose to follow through on this matter.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I got the impression from the gentleman's remarks yesterday afternoon that it was the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to have less deficiency appropriations.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It certainly is.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Well, now, further, the gentleman is giving the impression that he has no confidence in the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, which passes upon these refunds if they amount to over a certain small figure. Now the gentleman is giving the House the impression that nobody checks on these refunds. I will say that there is a set-up by law whereby the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation passes on these refunds and the legality of them, so that I hope the gentleman will not leave the wrong impression here.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Well, the gentleman from Illinois has not even mentioned the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, insofar as he knows. The gentleman from Illinois is dealing with money that goes out of the Treasury of the United States, not money that comes in. That is the function of the Committee on Appropriations, and that is the reason this item appears in an appropriation bill.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I just want to say that there is a special council that passes upon these refunds, and it is up to the Treasury Department, with the approval of the special committee set up by law, to pass upon it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. This subcommittee undertakes to clearly stay within its prerogatives and within its powers, so that when an item of $2,031,000,000 is submitted to us we take testimony from everybody in the Treasury Department who can throw some light on this subject.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. In asking the gentleman to yield, I first want to say that I entertain for him not only the highest regard but the most genuine fondness.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I appreciate that.

Mr. GORE. And any difference in point of view between him and me, both members of the Committee on Appropriations, is purely on a matter of principle, and no antagonistic personalities whatsoever are involved.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I understand that, and I reciprocate with equal fervor the grace that is so beautifully expressed by my friend, the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I would not ask the distinguished and able gentleman to yield except that I only had 5 minutes and I was unable in that time to develop adequately my point of view, and if the gentleman will let me ask him a couple of matter-of-fact questions, I will be glad to ask unanimous consent that his time be again extended.

Mr. DIRKSEN. With the greatest of pleasure.

Mr. GORE. Since the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee stated on the floor yesterday that this provision did not save one dime to the taxpayers of the country or to the Treasury, I wonder what virtue this provision has. Now, the gentleman undertakes to assign to it the virtue that he is going to have the Bureau of Internal Revenue come back to Congress and tell what they did with the money. The appropriation bill for last year contained the identical provision which you will find on page 11, which requires that an accurate report be made, and as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has pointed out, the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue searches and passes upon these refunds. Now the gentleman would not state, I am sure, that it is his intention to forestall and prevent prompt refunds of taxes, and then if that is his purpose, if that is the purpose of the committee and of his party, why do we place this limitation in the bill? The Treasury is certainly not going to make refunds to which taxpayers are not legally entitled. If you are going to bring in a deficiency bill, that will serve the purpose, but it makes useless work for the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the distinguished gentleman be extended three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Now, let us answer the first question: What is this item doing here anyway? Here is a tremendous document that was prepared especially by the Bureau of the Budget at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when we were working on the legislative budget.

Here is an analysis of the expenditure, not by the Appropriations Committee but by the Budget Bureau. When you get down to the Treasury Department, here is an item of $2,031,000,000 inserted by the Budget Bureau in the 1948 appropriation, and it is inserted in the 1948 budget of expenditure. So as we deal with appropriations and expenditures we of necessity have to deal with this item.

In response to the second question raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, this has been carried as an indefinite, open-end appropriation heretofore. I have set myself against indefinite appropriations ever since I learned to know the difference between what constitutes annual, ascertained, and definite appropriations and those that are permanent and indefinite. Our Budget is filled with billions of dollars of permanent and indefinite appropriations that we can examine in only a casual and cursory way from year to year. That is the reason not a single specific refund case was presented to the subcommittee.

What we say now is, this is going to be definite and this is going to be annual, and it is going to be for an ascertained amount. When in June of 1947 the Treasury officials come before the subcommittee we can then ask, "What did you do with the money? Let us see the whole record, now, so we can carefully examine and see whether the moneys of the taxpayers of the United States have been carefully and properly husbanded." So it is on the basis of making it definite that we conclude on the basis of their own testimony that this can be safely reduced by that amount, and that is implemented by the fact that additional testimony was offered, perhaps off the record, in the Committee on Ways and Means, and I am hopeful that the gentleman from New York will address himself to that matter very briefly.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I wonder how the distinguished gentleman arrived at the conclusion that because "several million" taxpayers are expected to be cut off the tax roll there would be fewer and not more claims for tax refunds.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The fact of the matter is that it appears in the expenditure budget over the hand of the President and the Budget itself. Why should more money be reflected in the expenditure budget than the money they actually need? Of course, they have not yet got over the technique of blank checks, of long ago. You just write out $500,000,000 for the President of the United States and then hope that at the end of the fiscal year he will probably give you a report. No; there is a change now. We are getting on a very definite basis. It is so easy to show a smaller budget and then revise it later in the year to show progress toward economy. We propose to make it reflect the true condition if we can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GORE. The estimates in the budget of the President were based upon present tax laws. It was very necessary that an estimate for tax refunds be contained in the budget, because tax refunds can be made only through disbursement from the Treasury. Disbursement from the Treasury can be made only upon authorization from the Congress. Therefore it was entirely proper, there was no legerdemain about it, that this item be included in the budget. It is entirely proper that in the budget of the Congress this item be included. But the gentleman and the distinguished committee of which he is a member have arbitrarily made a guess that the amount of refunds will be $800,000,000 less than was estimated by the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Budget and the President, and he assigns as one of his reasons that the taxes are going to be cut and several millions will be cut off the tax rolls. The President estimated and the Bureau of the Budget estimated that there would be claims for refund of $2,031,000,000 for the next fiscal year under present taxes. If the gentleman is going to reduce taxes 20 percent or by whatever amount, he is going to increase rather than decrease the amount of tax refunds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes to make proper answer to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Illinois thus far has said exactly nothing about the changes in taxes or changes in the internal-revenue laws that might diminish the number of tax payments. The gentleman from Illinois puts it strictly on the ground that the Treasury arithmetic is faulty and that it is a guess. Let us take a look. There is $420,000,000 in this estimated item for excess-profits-tax refunds. You will find in the statement made by the chairman of the Excess Profits Tax Council that it is stated that $8,000,000,000 in claims will be filed, but $8,000,000,000 had not actually been filed.

As a matter of fact, I asked the Treasury to send me the most recent and current statement. It came a day or two ago. Only $4,562,000,000, about one-half of the estimate, has been filed. It only increased about $450,000,000 since June of 1946. By their own testimony and by their own statement, they have disposed of nearly 19,000 of those cases, and that is about one-half the number of the cases involving $680,000,000. How much money was allowed? Here is their figure—$42,500,000. Yet, they come along and insert an estimate of $420,419,148 for fiscal 1948. If you take the most advantageous percentage figure, it probably would not run over $160,000,000. Can you wonder why the Treasury did not belabor the point?

Number two is the $123,000,000 which they said should be deducted just as soon as action was completed on the excise tax bill. Finally comes this estimate of more accurate returns as familiarity with existing tax law develops everywhere in the country. That is what the Treasury said to us. So, I believe we can safely diminish this amount by $300,000,000.

I am confident there will be sufficient money to take care of every taxpayer for whom my friend, the gentleman from Tennessee, is so concerned. That is the whole story.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. With respect to the liability of the Federal Government to taxpayers, we have to meet that liability when payday comes anyway?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right. Nobody quarrels about that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Of course, nobody claims that the subcommittee or the full Committee on Appropriations would ever deny a taxpayer a refund if he is entitled to it. Secondly, why does not the gentleman tell us of the advantages to a person who desires to stuff his budget looking forward to a future date?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman from Illinois wanted to be reasonably circumspect about it, although I mentioned it yesterday afternoon.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman can be reasonable and can still tell us.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Suppose all this money was not going to be used, and we have reason to believe from very creditable sources that it will not be used in fiscal 1948. If it were stuffed so that next year there can be a diminution in amount, somebody may decide that the Congress can take credit for a budget of expenditure which is a good deal smaller than if bookkeeping had been carried on in a very candid way. That is the whole story and I suppose it ought to be told. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate it is quite difficult for the members of the committee today to get into their heads clearly these huge figures. The last remarks of the gentleman from Illinois give the impression that somebody is trying to stuff the figures in the budget, insofar as these tax refunds are concerned.

Let me call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that for the fiscal year 1946 the Treasury estimated to the Congress in the President's budget message that the refunds for the fiscal year 1946 would be $3,116,800,710. The actual refunds, Mr. Chairman, amounted to $3,110,000,000, so that on that three thousand-million-dollars estimate the Budget Bureau was only off $6,000,000, that is a $6,000,000 overestimate. That shows that there was no stuffing at that time.

For the fiscal year 1947 the Treasury estimated that the tax refunds would amount to $2,138,807,000.

I call your attention to the fact that up to the end of the first 3 months of 1947 the tax refunds already amount to $1,200,000,000. So under the budget estimates, for the balance of this fiscal year, there is only allowed $800,000,000. This proves conclusively that they did not stuff their estimates for the fiscal year 1947.

The estimate for 1948, of course, is only $2,031,000,000. That shows it is coming down. There is no stuffing there at all. What is the use of putting figures in an appropriation bill that do not mean anything? The law says particularly that this money must be paid. The law says it must be paid. So, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] brought out, what is the use of putting a limitation on the amount of money that the Treasury can pay out when we have passed substantive law saying that as soon as this money is due to the taxpayers the Treasury Department must pay it right away? What is the use of saying in this appropriation bill, You cannot pay to the taxpayer what is legally due him if the total amounts to more than $2,231,000,000. It all goes to prove the point that you are trying to show the public you are now saving $800,000,000. It will just call for another deficiency item later in this session.

I think I could show you without question that for many years past the estimates that have been furnished under recent tax bills, and proposed tax bills, by the Treasury Department and the Budget Bureau, were unbelievably right. There is no stuffing in the President's budget and I hope the country does not feel that way.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield, gladly.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the RECORD should clearly show that this is really no saving. It is attempted to create the impression that this is a saving of $800,000,000 but it is not in fact any real economy; because if the refunds are greater than are carried in this bill, we will have to appropriate money later on, because it is the law and amounts to a contract. If this amount of money is appropriated and the refunds are less, the excess money would stay in the Treasury anyway, being appropriated for a specific purpose. So the $800,000,000 is in no sense an actual real saving of a single dollar.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. He is absolutely correct.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield with pleasure to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. CANFIELD. The chairman of the subcommittee is not trying to fool the House or the country on this item.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I will say for the gentleman that the gentleman from New Jersey said plainly and frankly that the subcommittee was not trying to give the impression that the Congress was going to save $800,000,000 by putting this estimate in it.

Mr. CANFIELD. One other word. The gentleman has been talking about Treasury estimates. I am reading from the hearings, page 569. Dr. Atkeson, who spoke for the Treasury, said:

> We are not, under the law nor in practice, responsible for preparing the estimates that enter into the President's budget.

They were not made by the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER] has expired.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. May I add further, the House should know this, that the action we took in this respect was unanimous on the part of the subcommittee, between the minority as well as the majority. Furthermore, when we presented our story to the full committee the other day there was no dissent in the full committee.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Well, you know there are times when the minority members of a subcommittee can be wrong also.

The only effect of this short-changing the Treasury $800,000,000 is that when the money appropriated in this bill is exhausted, then the taxpayers who are entitled to these refunds will be told, "We have no money in the Treasury with which to pay you, but never mind, Uncle Sam will pay you 6 percent interest until we get around to getting the Congress to give us additional money to pay you what is owed to you."

So you are not saving any money. In fact, you are charging the Federal Government 6 percent interest for failing to pay these claims immediately when the amount due is ascertained.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee with pleasure.

Mr. GORE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely correct. If this limitation on tax refunds has any effect upon expenditures of the United States Government it will increase the expenditures; in no way can it reduce them. But what I rose to answer was this inference that the Budget Bureau and the President made a political estimate. I thoroughly agree with the statement of the Bureau of Internal Revenue that they have no responsibility for the figures placed in the budget, that is the responsibility of the Bureau of the Budget and the President. They are responsible, however, for submitting estimates to the Bureau of the Budget and to the President. I have not talked to the Bureau of the Budget, but I have been down to inquire at the Bureau of Internal Revenue and they support entirely the accuracy of the estimates contained in the budget. They say that, in their opinion, if there is any error it is underestimated instead of overestimated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to see if I could make a slight contribution, at least toward keeping the record straight. I think there is a great deal of guesswork, and probably of necessity, in regard to this question of how much money should be placed in the appropriation bill relating to refunds. It is very easy to be misled, and I doubt if in years I have been quite so stunned as I was when we were having a meeting of a Joint Committee on Taxation to listen to the report of Judge Hamel. He has charge of refunds under the excess-profits tax provisions of section 722 of the revenue act. I made very careful notes, because, as I say, I was very much stunned when he made a statement of the total amount of refund claims filed to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

Judge Hamel, the chairman of the council, stated that as of January 1, 1947, some 8,500 taxpayers had filed claims under section 722 for the refund—gross—of about $6,000,000,000 of excess-profits taxes. Since claims for 1944 and 1945 had, in general, not yet been submitted, it was estimated that the total gross amount would be about $8,000,000,000. About that point I wanted to take some smelling salts, but he proceeded.

Judge Hamel pointed out, however, that since a reduction of excess-profits tax involves an increase in ordinary income tax, the net amount involved would be somewhat over half this amount. Moreover, since 1942 taxpayers have been permitted to defer payment of 33 percent of the excess-profits taxes involved in claims under section 722, and in many cases the reduction in tax by reason of these claims will be less than the payment already deferred.

Judge Hamel stated that to March 1, 1947, the council had settled claims amounting to $8,000,000 by allowing $1,800,000 of which payment of about $950,000 had been deferred. Moreover, claims aggregating about $19,000,000 had been withdrawn and on these payments of $3,200,000 had been deferred.

So the net result of that work was not a payment out of the Treasury but a net additional collection of taxes of about $2,300,000.

When asked to make a rough guess as to the ultimate payment out of the Treasury that might be expected as the result of settlement of all the section 722 claims, Judge Hamel stated that there might well be no net payment by the Treasury since on the basis of experience to date, amounts ultimately allowed might be greater than the taxes already deferred.

That is the way it usually runs. In the case of these tax refunds nobody can tell, and the possibility is that when we get to them they will be reduced almost to a minimum. I just wanted to make the record clear from the statement I took down from Judge Hamel.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. Chairman, I express disappointment in the fact that this Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill of approximately $12,000,000,000 makes such a meager saving. After all of the charges of squandering and countercharges I heard here for the last several years, I had hoped that the Herculean efforts of the committee might indicate a larger amount in reduced spending. The net savings, I believe, is less than $100,000,000 in the aggregate.

I presume that the committee found it necessary to sort of doctor up the report in order to make it look good, so necessarily this estimate of refunds was tampered with. Now I think that the committee really finds itself in hot water because it rooted around in terrain it was not familiar with.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] said yesterday that he was going to give the committee some information which would indicate that this large item of estimated tax refunds really is a saving. Well, his explanation was not very convincing. No one in this House can tell me that a cut or a reduction—call it what you want—in the estimate covering tax refunds due the taxpayers constitutes a saving, because it does not. If the total amount of the estimate were eliminated entirely, it would not save one thin dime to the Treasury and to the American taxpayer. Therefore, this figure of $800,000,000 is just spurious nonsense. It should not be considered here at all. If you take it out and the amount exceeds what the committee provides—that is, if the amount of refunds exceeds the amount that the committee provides herein—we will have to make a deficiency appropriation later. We in the Committee on Ways and Means handled this matter before, and it was through our study that the authority to refund was established. I know how interested the minority was at that time in the expeditious refunding of every excess dime that belonged to the taxpayer. There was no partisan facet to this move at the time. We were all interested in trying to speed legitimate refunds due under the law. I sat with the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] as a member of the joint committee at the time when we listened to witnesses testifying about these refunds under section 722, and we did everything we could to speed up proper handling. I do not know whether this will slow it down or not, but I dare say that on the surface it appears it might, because if we limit the amount of the estimate, and the refunds exceed that amount, we are going to have to wait until the Committee on Appropriations gets together and provides authority to pay it out. In the meantime, the Treasury will have to pay 6 percent on the outstanding debt to the taxpayers. That is no way to save taxpayers' money, and I do not think that is what you want to do. In the meantime, the report indicates to Mr. John Q. Citizen that we are making a huge saving here, or at least he anticipates a saving of $890,000,000, when, as a matter of fact, the sum total will be less than $100,000,000.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. There is one other phase of this matter that should be emphasized a little more than has been up to this point. The whole purpose in carrying a provision of this type is in the interest of the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. DINGELL. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. Where more money has been collected from them by their Government than they owe under the law. That is the only purpose of having this provision here.

Now then, if you are going to impose the limitation contained in this bill, and if that amount is exceeded and the taxpayers are entitled to receive that money back, it means they may have to wait until Congress passes a deficiency appropriation bill to receive money they are already entitled to.

Mr. DINGELL. That is correct. I agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD], who was standing before the time was fixed, for 5 minutes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman from Michigan is a certified public accountant of very great ability, and I would like to ask him whether or not these amounts for tax refunds should not be chargeable against tax income instead of placed in the budget, which provides for expenditures for the Government.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As to the exact manner the Treasury and the Bureau of the Budget would handle these items in their bookkeeping, I would not want to say at this particular time, but I do not know of anyone in this Congress who would support a proposition which delays the paying of refunds to taxpayers who are entitled to those refunds. I do not know how any Congress or any committee would decline to make appropriations at the request of the responsible Government officials; and if the responsible Government officials have the abilities we are paying them for, they will have the estimates up here in time for the Congress to make the appropriations so that payment can be made on the due date, and I assume that the Congress will be in session in the months to come and in the years to come, and, personally, I am very emphatically and categorically in favor of this reduction and against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. At the same time, I want to say that I do not know how anyone can support a group of taxpayers any better than through strict budgetary control, and I make that remark in response to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER]. Of course, these refunds are in the interest of the taxpayer who paid in excess of his liability, but it is in the interest of the taxpayer for this Congress and future Congresses to hold budgets within reasonable figures.

Here is a philosophy with which I entirely disagree, and I read from page 1224 of the RECORD of the current session:

> I would far rather, as we start this new and useful budget mechanism, to set a spending ceiling figure high enough so that when the session is over we will not only have lived up to our pledge to stay within it, but we will have a margin of safety left. The Congress would then stand in a better light with the people we represent as being responsible. What extra margin we might be able to cut under our own spending ceiling—set in advance of the minute examination of appropriation requests—would be hailed as an extra windfall for economy.

If you can think of anything more destructive to the taxpayer, than that type of philosophy, tell me some day what it is. It is like a factory superintendent coming before the board of directors. He sets up a budget, we will say, for $100,000, for repair and maintenance of a mill, when he knows good and well he can get through with $60,000. But he stuffs his budget so that at the end of the period he can come in and throw up his hands and say, "Boss, isn't it swell? I saved you $40,000; I give you back a windfall of $40,000."

Now, this is skulduggery on the part of anyone who has anything to do with the budget; and our budgeteers have been so loose in past years with the funds of the taxpayers of this country that I think we have degenerated into moral sin as far as economic morality is concerned, and I am in favor of tightening down the lid, and when any budget comes in here, question the thing in every way we can, and then screw it down a little, and then let them come in and justify every penny they get.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Was not the argument used in revising the January budget of 1946, in the month of August 1946, to show a fine saving, perhaps, when as a matter of fact it was just loose fiscal policy when the budget came before the Congress in the first instance?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is exactly what it was, and it is what has been carried on for 2 years. It is time for us to stop it. We have been entirely too loose. If we want to do the right thing for the people we will reduce the budget to the irreducible minimum based on the facts we could get at that time and the conditions which prevailed in this country and throughout the world. Then as the necessity arises, if it does, let those facts be brought to the Congress and let the budget be increased at that time through deficiency appropriations or otherwise.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. Is there not a very substantial reason why every item in the budget should be scrutinized by the committee in charge, that the spenders are the ones after all that appear with a vested interest to get more money? Is not that true?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly that is true. Our spending has been so great that we have created vested interests all over this country. It is time to cut off some of the gravy.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GORE: On page 12, line 20, strike out the sum "$1,231,000,000" and insert "there is hereby appropriated such amount as may be necessary for prompt payment of tax refunds."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GORE) there were—ayes 57, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Printing and binding: For printing and binding for the Bureau, $4,000.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as an indication of what fake economy can do, I call attention to a situation existing in the customs service at the port of Boston.

It has become necessary at the port of Boston to dispense with the services of approximately 200 temporary day laborers because of the lack of funds with which to hire these men.

These temporary day laborers, hired only when the volume of importations warrant, are used to truck bales of wool to and from scales, boring the bales to obtain samples, and similar manual labor, all under the supervision of customs inspectors. These laborers are also used in connection with the handling of general cargo but in the main are used in connection with wool importations.

During the current fiscal year, from July 1, 1946, to February 15, 1947, 247,018,908 pounds of foreign wool were entered for consumption at warehouse at the port of Boston. The Wool Trade Association anticipate a heavy import movement of wool during the remainder of the current fiscal year—and in fact for the next 2 years. Thus, using the quantity of wool received since July 1, 1946, we can expect approximately 148,211,340 pounds of wool between now and June 30, 1947.

Seventy-five percent of the wool expected will be Australian and Cape wools, which, from experience over many years, gains from 4 to 12 pounds per bale over the invoice entered weights. Taking 6 pounds per bale as the average increase in weight the following computation is submitted to show the amount of revenue that would be collected if funds are made available for the weighing and boring of wool:

Quantity expected to be imported at Boston, Mass., 148,211,340 pounds.

Seventy-five percent of above wool will gain weight on voyage of importation, 111,158,507 pounds or approximately 370,528 bales.

Three hundred seventy thousand five hundred and twenty-eight bales at 6 pounds per bale increase in weight equals 2,223,168 pounds net.

Using average yield of 60 percent, 1,333,901 pounds clean content.

Duty of 34 cents per pound, $453,526.34 loss in revenue if wool is not weighed.

If imported wools are not weighed the laboratory percentage of clean content cannot be used, and it is necessary to have determination of percentage of clean content made by the visual method. Determination of percentage of clean content by visual method has resulted over the years in an average increase of 2 percent over the entered yield, whereas determination of percentage of clean content under laboratory method has resulted in an average increase of 4 percent over the entered yield. Thus, in addition to the loss in revenue of approximately $453,526.34 outlined above, there would be a further loss in revenue of approximately $15,117.42, due to the 2-percent loss in percentage of clean content between visual and laboratory method of determination, a total estimated loss in revenue of $468,643.76 for the remainder of the current fiscal year at the port of Boston.

The majority of the 200 or more temporary laborers employed at the port of Boston are veterans, and they are deserving of every consideration, particularly when their continued employment will prevent a loss in revenue of approximately $468,643.76 through an expenditure of $100,000 for salaries.

The Customs Service is without funds for the employment of these temporary day laborers who are urgently needed to aid in weighing and boring wool importations. The granting of a deficiency appropriation will permit of the employment of these laborers and at the same time result in a net increase in revenue of $368,643.76.

I call your attention to an article appearing in the American Import and Export Bulletin, volume XXVI, No. 2, February 17, 1947, which clearly evidences that more customs personnel is urgently needed throughout the United States. The article is based on the preliminary report on the field service of United States Customs made by the National Council of American Importers, Inc. Survey was made of the customs personnel situation at the headquarters ports of the 20 leading customs districts in the United States. Assisting the National Council of American Importers in this survey were the Baltimore Association of Commerce, Commerce and Industry Association of New York, Detroit Board of Commerce, Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, New York Board of Trade, Norfolk Association of Commerce, Portland (Maine) Chamber of Commerce, St. Albans (Vt.) Chamber of Commerce, San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, Seattle Chamber of Commerce, and many others. This article is the preliminary report of the National Council of American Importers, Inc. The survey made by other than a governmental agency should prove of value. The economic report submitted to the Congress by President Truman on January 8, 1947, stresses the importance of international trade to the domestic aspects of employment, production, and purchasing power. The budget message submitted to the Congress on January 10, 1947, showed actual receipts from customs for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1946, as $435,000,000, with estimates for the fiscal year 1946–47 as $496,000,000, and for the year 1947–48 as $517,000,000. These figures show a carefully estimated trend of steadily increasing imports of dutiable foreign products and the Customs Service should have an adequate force to expeditiously handle these imports.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington.

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. McCORMACK: Reference is made to your telephone request today for immediate and detailed information concerning the effect the action of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives in cutting by $3,500,000 the estimates for the appropriation, "Collecting the revenue from customs, 1948," will have on the Customs Service if it stands.

The current situation in the Customs Service is very difficult and highly unsatisfactory to the public. Shortage of personnel has resulted in delays in the clearance of merchandise and travelers and in the settlement of duty liabilities. Some relief from this situation was included in the $36,000,000 estimate submitted for the 1948 customs appropriation.

If the cut of $3,500,000 stands, we must operate in the fiscal year 1948 on approximately $2,365,000 less than the rate of expenditure at which we were operating during the month of February 1947, the last period for which figures are available.

As 93½ percent of the customs appropriation is disbursed for salaries, and there is practically no possibility of curtailment in the remaining 6½ percent, covering rental of space, telephone service, cartage of examination packages, etc., this reduction will require the separation of such a substantial number of employees that some activities must be discontinued.

Careful examination of the possibilities for meeting this situation satisfies me that the only activity that can be discontinued without a substantial revision of statutory law is that directed toward the prevention of smuggling. While this is a clear statutory duty of the Customs Service, there is no statutory prescription as to how it shall be conducted and the effectiveness of our smuggling control has always depended upon the action of the Congress in furnishing funds.

Other functions of the Customs Service create bottlenecks through which all carriers, goods, and travelers entering the country must pass. The treatment to be given these carriers, goods, and travelers is prescribed by law and the Customs Service must operate to permit their passage through the customs control and to keep the records and accounts required by law in connection with their movement and the collection of the revenue incident thereto.

It is therefore clear that if the $3,500,000 cut stands, the larger part of it must be met by the separation from our service of about 800 employees, practically all from the customs border patrol that operates against smuggling on the Mexican and Canadian boundaries and from the port patrols that operate against smuggling of narcotics, jewelry, watches, and other articles at the seaports and against the theft of merchandise from customs custody.

The total number of customs border patrolmen at the present time is 351 and the total number of port patrol officers on the pay roll is 1,605, including supervisory officers. It therefore appears that if we must meet this cut it can only be by separating about 200 customs border patrolmen and 600 port patrol officers. The border patrolmen are located in groups of twos and threes, mostly in isolated areas and small towns along the boundaries. The port patrol officers are principally at Seattle, Portland, Oreg., San Francisco, Los Angeles, Honolulu, New Orleans, Galveston, Mobile, Tampa, Miami, Norfolk, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. At each of these ports the patrol force will have to be reduced about 40 percent for lack of funds.

In addition to the foregoing, the part of the $3,500,000 cut which reflects a disallowance of additional employees to cope with the recognized increase in customs activities means that essential manpower must be supplied by abolishing positions for one activity in order to supply the additional employees absolutely required to collect the revenue from customs and maintain an orderly movement of carriers, goods, and passengers. This will mean a further depletion of the port patrol forces and the separation of those present incumbents of port-patrol officer positions who cannot meet the eligibility requirements for the positions which must be filled to avoid a break-down of the other activities of the customs service. This will require abolishing another 40 percent of the port-patrol-officer positions now filled, or a total of 80 percent.

The net result will be a discontinuance of customs patrol activities on the Canadian border except insofar as the overburdened Immigration Service can cover this work, and a reduction of smuggling prevention at the seaports to the activities of searching squads. The resulting increase in smuggling which will inevitably follow will not only cost more in revenue than any saving, but will be even more detrimental to the businessmen who will face the competition of smuggled and stolen goods.

Very truly yours,

W. R. JOHNSON,
Commissioner of Customs.

Mr. Chairman, in the bill as reported, the committee fixes the appropriation for rent for post-office quarters at $13,000,000, a reduction of $457,000 below the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget and $35,000 below the estimated expenditures for this item for 1947.

If the Post Office Department is to operate efficiently, it should have sufficient money in its rent appropriation to obtain suitable and adequate quarters. We all know that rents are increasing all over the country, and especially in metropolitan areas and I do not see how the Post Office Department can continue to rent satisfactory quarters, in the face of this continuing rise in rentals, with the reduction that the committee has made in this item.

Undoubtedly there are places throughout the country where more space should be provided to properly carry on the post-office business and there is certainly no provision for this in this bill, which does not provide even as much as the estimated expenditures for 1947.

Considering the entire situation, it seems to me that the amount recommended by the committee for this item is entirely inadequate to meet reasonable needs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reimbursement to District of Columbia, benefit payments to White House Police and Secret Service forces: For reimbursement to the District of Columbia on a monthly basis for benefit payments made from the revenues of the District of Columbia to members of the White House Police force and such members of the United States Secret Service Division as are entitled thereto under the act of October 14, 1940 (54 Stat. 1118), to the extent that such benefit payments are in excess of the salary deductions of such members credited to said revenues of the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1948, pursuant to section 12 of the act of September 1, 1916 (39 Stat. 718), as amended, $68,500.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the members of the Appropriations Committee who brought in this bill are to be commended today. We are making a start back over the road toward economy in Government. In debating and examining the budget and through the actions of the Appropriations Committee we have stopped the Government pay train which, during the past 14 years, has been speeded up by the philosophy of "spend and spend and tax and tax," till it might be illustrated as reaching a speed of 100 miles an hour.

We have stopped the train. We have turned it around. We have headed it back toward sanity in government, toward relief for the taxpayers and in the hope of putting the Government on a sound financial basis which is so important to the future of our Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I have been a little disappointed to find the members of the Administration criticizing the efforts of the Republican majority and constantly throwing in our way every possible obstruction. This is a great day for the American people and we must repeat our actions and efforts on every Appropriation bill as it comes to the floor of the House. Savings have been written into this bill which in the ultimate will doubtless amount to a little less than a billion dollars. Certainly we should have the support and cooperation of our Democratic friends because their constituents are being benefited by our actions and because their constituents want to reduce the cost of Government just as do the constituents of us Republicans. These reductions will shake about 25,000 people off the Government pay rolls. I know the people will be glad to hear this, and will applaud our efforts.

With the tremendous Federal debt hanging over the people, which amounts to $2,000 for every man, woman and child in America, we cannot keep this Government solvent unless we cut every unnecessary governmental expense out of all appropriation bills. That is the program of the Republicans who now hold the majority in this House.

We will continue to do our best to reduce Government expense and we hope in the future that we shall have the full cooperation of the minority party in the House in the interest of all of the taxpayers of the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1948 for the purchase, within the continental limits of the United States, of any standard typewriting machines (except bookkeeping, billing, and electric machines) at a price in excess of the following for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: Ten inches (correspondence models), $77; 12 inches, $82.50; 14 inches, $85.25; 16 inches, $90.75; 18 inches, $96.25; 20 inches, $103.40; 22 inches, $104.50; 24 inches, $107.25; 26 inches, $113.85; 28 inches, $114.40; 30 inches, $115.50; 32 inches, $118.25; or, for standard typewriting machines distinctively quiet in operation, the maximum prices shall be as follows for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: Ten inches, $88; 12 inches, $93.50; 14 inches, $99; 18 inches, $104.50: Provided, That there may be added to such prices the amount of Federal excise taxes paid or payable with respect to any such machines.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of Connecticut: On page 23, line 18, strike out line 18 to line 12 on page 24, inclusive.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, as I said yesterday during general debate on this appropriation bill, if I can have the attention of my colleagues for a few minutes I think you will agree with me that this language placing a ceiling on the price the Government can pay for typewriters is unfair, unreasonable, and not in the public interest. This amendment involves a matter of principle, right or wrong.

This proposition has an interesting history. In 1913 the Secretary of the Treasury through the General Supply Committee invited every manufacturer of typewriters to submit prices for which they would sell typewriters to the Government. Several manufacturers submitted bids each thinking that the low bidder would receive a contract to supply the full needs of the Government.

No such contract was awarded but the next year the Appropriations Subcommittee handling the Treasury and Post Office supply bill wrote language into their bill requiring the Supply Committee to pay no more than the low exclusive bid of the previous year.

That procedure was followed until 1922 when Congress through this same appropriation bill wrote into the law a price ceiling of $70 on standard typewriters. Last year the ceiling was raised to $77 which incidentally was a smaller increase than OPA had just approved for the typewriter industry. Just think for a minute about how much the cost of manufacturing a typewriter has increased since 1922 and how much better the machine of today is than those old machines.

In 1941, for example, the 10-inch standard typewriter sold for $115.50. As of a few months ago, the same model sold for $148.50. The question that plagues me is why this method of purchasing is limited to typewriters. There are no ceilings on the price the Government will pay for adding machines, calculators, or even for electric typewriters.

It is indicated in the hearings on this bill that we will need from 40,000 to 50,000 typewriters this year. No manufacturer likes to refuse to sell to his Government but some are being forced to do just that. The Royal Typewriter Co., for example, has refused to sell at this proposed ceiling. The L. C. Smith-Corona Typewriter Co. will supply but 500; Remington-Rand only 3,000. Underwood's limit is 5,000. The Royal Typewriter Co. makes nothing but typewriters. They cannot make up their loss on sales to the Government on some other product.

If I were to offer an amendment placing a price ceiling of $50 on adding machines or some other piece of office equipment, it would not have the support of half a dozen Members of this House. If I tried by amendment to limit the amount we would pay for telephone toll calls to say 50 percent of the listed charge, no one of you would support such an amendment. This proposed ceiling of $77 on a standard typewriter cannot be justified. Oh, yes, the Treasury Department likes this ceiling. So does the Budget Bureau, but they do not justify it in the hearings.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield to my friend and colleague from Connecticut.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not true that this constitutes a kind of OPA price ceiling on typewriters?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. It is a bad form of price control. The gentleman is correct. I am sorry to see it in the bill.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. What justification for this limitation has been advanced by members of the committee?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I assume the committee will attempt to justify it on the floor, but I call your attention to the hearings, pages 861 to 876. There is no justification whatsoever.

Mr. COOLEY. Do they undertake to place price ceilings on any other article?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. No. Electric typewriters, adding machines, paper clips, and everything else bought by the Government are not under any price ceiling. This not only applies to the Treasury Department but this limitation or ceiling applies to every agency of the Government.

Mr. COOLEY. It has been suggested that this provision has been in the bill for 20 years. Of course, that still does not make it right.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I will be glad to insert the history of it in the RECORD. I inserted it in the RECORD yesterday.

I notice on page 874 of these hearings that there was an off-the-record discussion on this subject. Why the secrecy? It cannot be a military secret today. Previously the typewriter industry has been told that this matter of price ceilings would be looked into before another bill was brought into the House. I submit that in all fairness, we should strike out this language today and then investigate. If any reasonable justification for this ceiling can be produced, it will have the support of the House, I am sure. The industry has held the bag all these years. They rate favorable consideration today.

I deeply appreciate the assurance given the House yesterday by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD], chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill, that his committee would investigate the cost of manufacturing typewriters and that they would try to work out a satisfactory solution. But again, why limit this procedure to typewriters? If we are going to adopt the policy of finding out the manufacturing cost of every item purchased by the Federal Government from paper clips to battleships, I will have nothing more to say about typewriter prices.

In closing, may I again urge my colleagues to change this amendment on the record disclosed in the hearings found on pages 861 to 875. I understand that the language I wish to strike from this bill is subject to a point of order. Rather than make the point of order, I submit this proposition to the judgment of the House, confident that you will act in the public interest by adopting this amendment.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. Is it not true that most of the companies are now operating under a consent decree issued by the courts?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Yes; but the consent decree has nothing whatsoever to do with the proposition. The gentleman mentioned that last evening and I inquired about it. The consent decree was issued by a court in New York State. It simply prohibits them from getting together and agreeing on a price at which they will sell typewriters. It forbids them to do the very thing this law makes mandatory that they do in furnishing the Government, and a distinguished Member of this Congress said on the record that we were compelling them to commit what would otherwise be a violation of the antitrust laws.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Is there any reason that the Government made clear that they should not buy typewriters in the same manner and follow the same procedure as is followed in the acquisition of any other property?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. No reason whatsoever that I can find out; and I repeat here that there can be no good reason.

Mr. COOLEY. The report indicates that the committee said they would make an investigation.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. They have promised that every year since I first came to Congress, in 1939—and that is not a reflection on any member of the present committee.

Mr. COOLEY. Has an investigation been made?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. If it has, no report has been made. I again call attention to the hearings.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. In all fairness, will not the gentleman admit that this is the second year that there has been an investigation?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. No; I can show the gentleman on the record that I have taken this up with the Appropriations Committee ever since I first came here in 1939. For many years they have had this arbitrary figure of $70, but in 1946 it was stricken out in a body I cannot mention. I wish to read one paragraph from a letter I have.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. MORRIS. In this particular instance it is a matter of long custom that we are up against.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I certainly think so. But my time is running out, and I should like to read one paragraph from a letter written by the vice president of one of the typewriter companies to a distinguished member of a legislative body:

> The low legislated Government price is well known to the buyers of typewriters, and in their minds it represents a well-considered governmental declaration of what the price of typewriters should be. This has presented a serious problem in dealing with foreign governments, who use every effort to secure the price which the United States Government implies is the value of American-made typewriters. This demand has become more insistent since the introduction of lend-lease.

Incidentally, this letter was written a year ago.

> The same demands, based on the same reasons, have been made by various States. One State has been considering the adoption of a regulation similar to that of the United States Government. Several years ago five States combined in an attempt to force the typewriter companies to accord them the price the United States Government fixes as the highest which should be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for an additional 5 minutes and that at the end of that time debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto do close.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, are there other Members who wish to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. CANFIELD. I have seen no indication of it.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to propound an inquiry to the gentleman from Connecticut as to whether or not he has or will offer an amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I have offered an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for an additional 5 minutes and that at the end of that time all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do close.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, this is a speech I do not like to make.

As far as this appropriation bill is concerned, the subcommittee has been subject to more pressure from the typewriter lobby than from any other group—or any of the agencies which received a reduced appropriation. They have approached us with high-priced lawyers, and threatened boycotts, so that they could raise the price of typewriters sold to the Government more than $40 per machine. These lobbyists have phoned my office frequently and persistently. They have appeared in person to try to influence me to have this provision stricken from the bill.

All this they have done despite the fact that the subcommittee, for the first time in many years, if not in history, gave them an opportunity to appear before the committee, and to present their statements for the record.

Except for one company, which mentioned the $40 per machine increase, the other companies refused to tell us how much the prices would rise. Nevertheless, on the basis of requests from the agencies it can be safely estimated that removing this restriction would result in a minimum increase of $160,000 per year, and this is a most conservative figure.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Will the gentleman say that those who appeared before his committee and testified are not officials of the company but local salesmen and sales managers. May I say that I have not had a single call from any official of the two large typewriter companies in my district. I had to go to the salesmen in the district for information.

Mr. CANFIELD. I am glad to hear that the gentleman from Connecticut has not been importuned the way the chairman of the subcommittee has been.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Not once.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROSS. Does the gentleman know whether these typewriter lobbyists are registered or not?

Mr. CANFIELD. I do not know.

The committee could not get the evidence it desired to prove that any new typewriters at all were necessary. We have received reports that thousands of typewriters are right now stockpiled throughout the Government agencies, and that used but usable machines are available in Government warehouses for any agency that desires them. The typewriter people could not present figures to show how many machines the Government had bought in recent years. They would not tell us their costs. The Federal agencies could not tell us how many typewriters had been purchased. The committee was asked by the typewriter companies, pressure was exerted by the typewriter lobby, to force the committee to act without sufficient knowledge, to remove this section without full and complete investigation.

Why are the companies so anxious to have this price ceiling removed? What are their motives and their objectives? Why are they not willing to have the investigative staff of the Appropriations Committee make a study and report back? Why is action demanded now, after more than 20 years of silence and acquiescence?

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. The fact that this provision has been contained in the bill for the past 20 years does not appeal to me as a justification. Will the gentleman as chairman in charge of the bill give the House some sound reason why this amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut should not be adopted and why this apparent discrimination should be allowed to continue?

Mr. CANFIELD. I shall discuss this.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Does the gentleman from New Jersey, the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, have any idea of what the cost of production of these typewriters is and what the percentage of profit is?

Mr. CANFIELD. I have no idea. Our committee is going to try to get those figures.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Did the gentleman get any idea from interviewing these people representing the typewriter industry how much in their opinion it would cost the Government to buy individual typewriters?

Mr. CANFIELD. For the most part they were not helpful in that respect.

The committee has attempted to reach the facts. We interviewed representatives of all the companies who wished to appear. We had before us representatives of the Federal Bureau of Supply. And we came to the conclusion that here was an instance which must be subjected to the floodlights of official scrutiny, on which true and complete facts should be in the hands of the committee. We do have evidence that the Government can secure sufficient typewriters at the present price to supply its needs for fiscal 1948. We can assure the House that we will have the desired report from the investigating staff before the next bill for this purpose is presented to Congress.

You will note on page 865 of the hearings that if this section is stricken, the typewriter lobby has already prepared a sales talk to convince government purchasing agents that all typewriters now used by the Federal Government should be replaced. It is easy to determine that this law, in restricting the number of typewriters the manufacturers sell to the Government, forces the Government to make the greatest possible use out of the machines it has at present.

In conclusion, let me quote the statement appearing on page 872 of the hearings, made to the committee by Mr. William Freeman, deputy director in charge of Purchase Branch of the Federal Bureau of Supply:

> We feel that a limitation, such as has existed on typewriters—not necessarily at the existing price but a limitation—should continue to exist, and if an increase in that limitation should be considered, that the companies should be forced to show their costs, to prove that the price increase, whatever it might be, would be justified to allow for a reasonable profit, but not an excessive one, in relation to the probable cost to do government business. We believe that from prewar records and studies we can ascertain the number of typewriters involved of all kinds would be between 40,000 and 50,000 a year.

That, gentlemen, is the chief purchasing officer of our Government. His figures can be relied on. Even his minimum figure would mean that removal of this section would result in an additional cost of $168,000 per year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can the gentleman inform us as to whether or not, in the testimony taken before the subcommittee, the representatives of manufacturers indicated that they intended or would be willing to sell or would demand a price of the Government as high as they are demanding of private purchasers?

Mr. CANFIELD. Some of them indicated that they would allow a discount price similar to that allowed schools throughout the country.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. If the Government were to request bids, could not the seven companies submit bids and could not typewriters be purchased on the basis of the lowest bid?

Mr. CANFIELD. The Purchasing Officer of the Federal Government is opposed to that practice at this time.

I quote further from Mr. Freeman's testimony:

> From the purchase standpoint we feel that it would be beneficial to have a limitation. I do not believe that any one typewriter company, from what they have told me, would be interested in having all the Government business. I do not know that it would be a good idea to change the type of limitation. The limitation has worked out well from a practical standpoint.

Mr. LeFevre, Assistant to the Deputy Director in Charge of Purchases, made this statement:

It is the view of this Bureau that a retention of a price limitation on typewriting machines is desirable. The ordinary system of competitive bidding would not by itself assure the Government a fair price. The preference for the make of typewriter on which the user is trained, an attitude fostered by the manufacturers, makes it unsound for the Federal Government to attempt to have its needs met by any one or two of the producers. * * *

It is the opinion of the Bureau of Federal Supply that the present method of fixing the maximum price of typewriters by statutes annually reviewed should be continued. * * *

It is contended by the manufacturers that the cost of sales to Government is no less than commercial sales. It should be borne in mind, however, that sales to the Government are without credit risk, advertising expense, collection cost, etc.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. To come back to the question raised by the gentleman from North Carolina, what would stop these typewriter companies from getting together to fix a price at which they would sell their product to the Government? Furthermore, is it not reasonable to assume that as long as there is no pressure behind these typewriter companies to sell their products that they are selling them at a profit to the Government at this time?

Mr. CANFIELD. They want the Government's business, do not have any doubt about that, and we have now, may I say to the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Montana, a qualified staff. We have some expert men to go into this situation fully and completely. A request has been made for that investigation by the subcommittee, and it is in progress now.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman did not answer the question asked by the gentleman from Montana. The answer should be, of course, that the typewriter manufacturers could not get together in violation of the antitrust laws any more than the manufacturers of any other article. Now, it seems to me that the principle involved in this case is entirely wrong. If you are going to apply this principle to typewriters, why not apply it to automobiles and to every other article purchased by the Government?

Mr. CANFIELD. We do apply it to automobiles. The gentleman happens to mention an item that we do apply it to. It is applied to automobiles by statute now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER of Connecticut) there were—ayes 11, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay and allowances: For pay and allowances prescribed by law for commissioned officers, cadets, warrant officers, petty officers, and other enlisted personnel, active and retired, temporary cooks, surfmen, substitute surfmen, and six civilian instructors; retired pay for certain members of the former Life Saving Service authorized by the act approved April 14, 1930 (14 U. S. C. 178a); not exceeding $10,000 for cash prizes for men for excellence in boatmanship, gunnery, target practice, and engineering competitions; transportation of dependents of Coast Guard personnel on active duty and retired and Reserve officers and of retired and Reserve enlisted personnel, of grades entitled to transportation of dependents in the Regular Coast Guard, when ordered to active duty (other than training) and upon relief therefrom; carrying out the provisions of the act of June 4, 1920 (34 U. Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, within the next few days we will listen to a great deal of talk on the subject of stopping communism in Greece and the Mediterranean area. While we shout about the advance of communism abroad the New Deal executive departments are apparently immune to what is going on within those agencies.

Mr. Chairman, I was much surprised when I read part of the hearings on the Treasury Department appropriation bill for 1948. I refer to page 261 of the hearings, where a discussion was held between the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD], chairman of the subcommittee which has this bill for consideration, and a Mr. Jordan who is a member of the Treasury committee which has the responsibility for investigating un-American allegiances in the Treasury Department. I refer now to page 261 and will quote the testimony of Mr. CANFIELD and Mr. Jordan:

Mr. CANFIELD. What steps are being taken to check against persons with un-American allegiances obtaining and retaining employment in the Treasury?

Mr. JORDAN. The Treasury Department has a committee headed——

Mr. CANFIELD. You are chairman of that committee, are you?

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. T. F. Wilson.

Mr. CANFIELD. You are a member of the Treasury committee?

Mr. JORDAN. The Treasury committee that has been functioning for the last 4 years, consisted of the Director of Personnel, the general counsel, and a representative from the bureau in which the employee was located.

Mr. CANFIELD. Are you the chairman of that committee in the Treasury?

Mr. JORDAN. The Director of Personnel is.

Mr. CANFIELD. How thorough is your work? For instance, how many persons have you discharged from the Treasury for un-American activities? We want you to elaborate on that a little bit. The Secretary the other day stressed it, and I want you to tell us what the Treasury is doing about that.

Mr. JORDAN. I would have to check to see how many we have discharged over a period of time. Our whole procedure is undergoing change.

Mr. Chairman, subsequently the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] projected himself into the examination of Mr. Jordan and on this same page, 261, he said:

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Jordan, going back a little to this Loyalty Committee that has been established by Executive order of the President, I understand you have designated on the committee by the Secretary of the Treasury. Isn't that the way it works?

Mr. JORDAN. Yes, I am a member of the Treasury Department Committee; Assistant Secretary Foley is a member of the President's Temporary Commission on Employee Loyalty.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But what are the functions of that Loyalty Committee, and what are the admonitions and injunctions they operate under? What is your duty as you see it under such Executive order.

Mr. JORDAN. Under Executive Order No. 9300 of February 5, 1943, there was an interdepartmental committee set up that was to act in an advisory capacity to the Department. That committee established certain rules that the Department must follow.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is there a copy of the rules available?

Mr. JORDAN. I could get them.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Insert them in the hearings, if you please, in connection with your remarks.

Mr. JORDAN. Yes, sir.

Continuing, Mr. Chairman, on page 267, and again the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is questioning:

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let us get back to the Executive order.

What did the loyalty committee do by way of setting up rules and regulations? You must have adopted certain standards, didn't you?

Mr. JORDAN. The standards were adopted for us by the interdepartmental committee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Could you tell me in a general way just what those standards are?

Mr. JORDAN. The main requirement was that a person must be given an oral hearing. In our experience with that requirement, we have found that we could not convict anybody on an oral hearing.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Tell us a little about that. Were you a member of this hearing?

Mr. JORDAN. We had this character investigation report, and in that report some people who testified against the individual were named, and others were not.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How did the individuals' names get to you in the first place? Did you get them by letter, information, was it in a subrosa fashion, or how did you get the information?

Mr. JORDAN. Character investigations, principally, or if the person was in a position where a character investigation was not required, he might be picked up by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How many names were certified to you by the Treasury?

Mr. JORDAN. I would have to guess at that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Would you guess at it, please, and correct it later for the record?

Mr. JORDAN. My guess would be about 352.

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—The number of cases given in the original testimony was 125, which was found to be incorrect.)

Mr. DIRKSEN. There were 352 names submitted to you, who were charged with possible disloyalty, or there was an allegation that they may have been guilty of disloyalty? Is that correct?

Mr. JORDAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will you proceed from there, please?

Mr. JORDAN. Early in this new procedure, the committee found it was necessary to hold a hearing in a case. However, this was our experience. The man was given ample opportunity to state his case. He could bring in all the witnesses that he wished, but we could not get any witnesses against him.

Oftentimes the witnesses indicated to the investigator that they would not want their names mentioned, or, if we did have their names, by the time we got the case they may have been transferred out of the Washington area. So the procedure didn't work. We could not convict a man unless we could get testimony against him.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How many of those hearings did you actually hold?

Mr. JORDAN. We actually held one.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Just one?

Mr. JORDAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Out of 352 cases?

Mr. JORDAN. Yes; and we attempted to hold another one, but were unable to get the case to the point of actual hearing.

Mr. DIRKSEN. When was the last hearing?

Mr. JORDAN. This one case was during 1943. The hearing was held on November 1, 1943, after the Executive order was issued.

Mr. CANFIELD. Has anyone ever been discharged from the Treasury Department for disloyalty as a result of the investigation?

Mr. JORDAN. Yes; a few have.

Mr. CANFIELD. How many?

Mr. JORDAN. One person admitted that she was a Communist and we discharged her. A few people have been discharged because of information received during the trial period when we didn't have to submit it to this committee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What happened to those cases that were given to you on which you had no hearings?

Mr. JORDAN. The committee felt that on many of them the information was no good, and there was nothing against them. Therefore the employee was given a clean bill of health.

On others there may have been some doubt, but in view of the fact that we could not get any specific information with which we could charge the individual, nothing was done.

Mr. DIRKSEN. So the matter is thoroughly dormant now? In other words, no action was taken; is that correct?

Mr. JORDAN. No; it is not dormant now. The Secretary has reopened this matter in the last 2 or 3 months, and has appointed Assistant Secretary Foley to go fully into this whole picture, to work with the temporary commission that the President appointed not very long ago, to review this whole procedural situation.

I may say that our great difficulty has been a procedural one. If we follow court rules in the Department we could not get convictions.

In our attempts to handle this situation, in ferreting out these people, we must try to protect the Government and to do justice to people who merely are liberal-minded, but who have no communistic sympathies.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I want to point out here that nobody has been harmed by the injustices which may have been done, but I am equally determined that the situation must be met in Government.

If it is a question of hearsay, we must determine what procedure shall be followed—one which is fair, equitable, and unemotional.

Mr. Chairman, I was utterly amazed, and I am sure that Members of the House have been amazed, as I read the colloquy between Mr. Jordan and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] regarding the effort or lack of it that was made against the 352 people who were charged with subversive activities within the Treasury Department; the confession on the part of Mr. Jordan that only 1 case out of the 352 was actually pressed to the dismissal standpoint from 1943 until the present time. What a weak position on the part of the Treasury Department, when Mr. Jordan admits that the Secretary of the Treasury only within the last 2 or 3 months has again renewed an effort to meet the charges of communism within his Department. The responsibility, Mr. Chairman, rests with the Secretary of the Treasury, and nobody else. He cannot pass the buck.

Mr. Chairman, here we have the perfect example by New Deal executive agencies of temporizing and appeasing those who are charged with subversive activities in the governmental service. It is a situation that must be condemned by every Member of this House who has any interest in the perpetuation of his own Government.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that this subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee will follow through and ascertain what effort, if any, is being taken to eliminate subversive activities within the Treasury Department. It has a responsibility to the public also and should be the first to speak out and condemn the practice presently indulged in by that Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

This title may be cited as the "Treasury Department Appropriation Act, 1948."

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I rise in support of this bill, H. R. 2436. Voting to cut a recommended appropriation is neither easy nor politcally pleasant.

The Coast Guard means more to me personally perhaps than it does to other Members of this House. The Coast Guard Academy is located in my district. I know many of its staff well. I have great respect for the fine job being done there by Admiral Pine, Captain Olson, and the other officers of the Academy. I know of their work from personal observation.

I have a close family tie with the Coast Guard. I saw and know of the fine work done by this organization during the war.

Now that the war is over—and pray God it is over—we must go forward to a peacetime economy. Economy is more than just preaching—it is something we must practice.

A tax-conscious Nation demands more than talk. It demands that every department of the Government practice the same economy required of you and myself as individuals.

By our action today we may be suggesting to certain other departments of the Government that they can no longer "pass the buck" or load up to the Coast Guard.

In the future all of us may well be expected to do more with less. I am confident that the Coast Guard joins in the acceptance of that challenge.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I was very much surprised to read in the REC-ORD of yesterday criticism of the operation of loran and other aids to navigation by the Coast Guard and the weather stations on the Atlantic. I understand those things are matters of international agreement and the Coast Guard is committed to continue to operate these aids to navigation. The appropriation for those should not be cut.

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. I am of the opinion that the Coast Guard is not committed to the operation of all of them. It is being willed on them. There is some question as to what agency is going to be responsible in the future for the continuation of the operation of loran. I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but I believe I am correctly informed on that particular point.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I join with the preceding gentleman in defending that great body which has rendered such outstanding service not only in time of peace but in time of war to the people of America, the Coast Guard.

I was surprised yesterday at something the gentleman from New Jersey said, although I admire the gentleman very much—he is a personal friend—and I am sure he did not mean what he said. His words are in the RECORD. I read the words:

> Some of my colleagues will, a little later, give you specific examples of the waste, extravagance, and grandiose schemes of the Coast Guard.

Gentlemen, here is one of the oldest services in America, one that has written history up and down the coast line of America on the Atlantic and the Pacific, a service which, when war approached us, sprang to the defense of our country. They were prepared and had trained men, as well as training others. They landed the greater part of our troops on the islands of the Pacific. They manned the boats that carried the soldiers and sailors and marines from the transports. They contributed greatly to our glorious victories in the Pacific.

I noticed with interest, also, in the Star of yesterday afternoon the remarks of my dear friend, "that the party was now on the beam as far as economy goes." The gentleman from Illinois, I am sure, read that himself. It is a strange thing when the ax of economy falls, we find whose neck is caught under the ax. Here is a great agency of the Government which does not have the arm to reach out and defend itself in the halls of Congress as other Government agencies have. Neither do they try to walk up and down the halls in the lobby of the House Office Building and defend themselves as some other agencies do. Yet, in this bill they caught the ax harder on a percentage basis than any other agency that has been cut or probably will be cut.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONNER. I certainly yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. CANFIELD. I want my friend the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, to know that the words he just quoted which were the words I uttered yesterday were well thought out and well measured. Yes, I used the adjective "grandiose," and the Bureau of the Budget could have used the same word when they cut the Coast Guard estimates $49,000,000 after a $50,000,000 cut by the Treasury before they went to the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. BONNER. But, certainly, I think it was an injustice to use the word "scheming." There was no scheming because this agency is just as interested in performing its duties as any other agency. If they overstep in their endeavor to greatly expand their duty of life saving, aid to navigation, both in the air and on sea and try to reach out and get too much, that is another thing, but certainly the word "scheming" is unjust. Nevertheless, I will pass over that, for I am certain it is not true.

On page 1884 of the RECORD of yesterday there was a discussion between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GRIFFITHS] and myself based on a criticism heaped on the Coast Guard with respect to this training program. All of us who were here at the beginning of the war know that during the early stages of the war the Coast Guard trained men for the merchant marine. They trained them successfully and made them ready to perform their duties in the interest of the national defense. Yet, there appeared in the picture a program to separate the training that had been established by the Coast Guard and which was being carried out with credit and perfection. This effort was successful and now we have a dual training program for men of practically the same type, Coast Guard and merchant marine, with a Merchant Marine Academy. This should have been carried on by the Coast Guard, who were prepared to do the training and who were doing the training well at that time. I think the present chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries will bear out what I say.

As for economy performed in this bill, remember that we may yet live to rue the day that we performed such economy. Whatever may be done here nothing can take from the record the glorious performance and unselfish sacrifices of this service, both in time of peace, war, and disaster, both on sea and land. North Carolina, Mr. Chairman, has furnished some of the most outstanding men in this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER] has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I can assure the Committee of the Whole that we are not wanting in devotion to a very fine service, known as the Coast Guard, but when the chairman of the subcommittee selected the word "grandiose," I think it was very properly applied. One need only look at the testimony and look at the figures to understand tht the word bears very close application. It was intended to convey the idea of a much-expanded service.

For instance, in 1940 the Coast Guard had 3 rear admirals. In 1948 they are asking for 18 rear admirals—six times as many as we had in the last prewar, peacetime year.

In 1940 the Coast Guard had 33 captains. When they came before our committee for the fiscal year 1948 they asked for 114, which is nearly three times as many captains.

In 1940 they had 69 commanders. They come now and ask us for 205 commanders. Would you not say that the adjective "grandiose" is rather properly applied when an agency reaches out for that kind of an expansion program?

Now, that is not all. I said to the admiral and to his budget officer, "How much did you ask your own budget committee for in the Treasury Department for the next fiscal year?" He said, "$231,749,000." Mind you, in 1940 they had $26,000,000, in the last peacetime year. Now they were requesting $231,000,000 from their own budget officer. So what happened? Before they even emerged from their own department of government they had been cut $60,000,000. Then they had to come before the President's Budget Bureau. What happened there? They cut them another $39,000,000. Ninety-nine million dollars was cut out of the Coast Guard before the bill ever landed in the bosom of the subcommittee. You talk about fat in the Government budget today. Why, they recognize it in the budget bureaus of every department. Otherwise they could not cut out 70 percent of that appropriation before it even landed in the subcommittee.

I said to Admiral Farley and Captain Richmond, "If we Members of Congress should delete another $50,000,000, we would be criticized and vilified and calumniated." If I had my way, we would have cut out $50,000,000, but I had to compromise on that item. What we have got to determine is this: Is it going to be one of these expansive agencies to work all over the world, or is it going to be a coast guard? They appeared before us in civilian attire. It is considered a civilian agency, but its program makes it appear as an auxiliary navy. I want to know whether it is a coast guard or whether it is a miniature navy. If it is going to be navy, then let the Navy take care of them. If it is a coast guard, it has no business running loran stations out in Guam and away up in Alaska and all over the blue water of the seven seas.

They had $26,000,000 in 1940 and they ask for $231,000,000 in 1948. We cut them down substantially.

One other item. Make no mistake about this. The things they asked for next fiscal year is going to be the base for the future. Let me prove it to you. I said to Captain Richmond, "For budget purposes 1948 will be sort of a base year, and you will go forward from that year, not backward." He said, "That is correct."

"In other words, it will be your base year," and he said, "Yes, sir."

You see, 1948 if they could have contrived $231,000,000, that would have been the springboard for the future. Then I said: "Captain Richmond, if every agency of government will do that there will not be enough money in the United States of America if we hock everything of value in order to meet the demands of the Government agencies."

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. I take it that the amount they were asking was greater than what we spent on the entire Navy in 1932, was it not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would not go quite that far.

Mr. DINGELL. Pretty nearly that much.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But it was a very substantial amount and I can remember the time when the appropriations for the Navy Department did not amount to much more than $230,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. I wonder if the gentleman from Illinois who did want to cut the Coast Guard $50,000,000 will be willing to admit that he had to scrap a lot with the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right. I think my colleagues on the subcommittee were filled with generosity when they marked up this bill.

I say that after everything has been said and done we have contrived a splendid bill with sufficient funds for every agency to properly express its proper functions and serve the people of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rural delivery service: For pay of rural carriers, auxiliary carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual and sick leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, tolls and ferriage, and necessary expenses of the rural delivery service, $129,167,000, of which not less than $200,000 shall be available for extensions and new service.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I join other members representing rural districts in regretting that a reduction of $200,000 has been made in the budget estimates for rural free delivery. There is a demand and there is a need for additional rural routes in practically every agricultural section of our country. This reduction in appropriations means the elimination of 150 additional carriers on 150 new rural routes. This means that many farmers at the end of the road will not have free mail delivery service.

Mr. Chairman, the farmer is as much entitled to this service as any resident of any city in the United States. When our country was at war and our very survival was at stake, we did not pass up the man who lives at the fork of the creek. We sent his sons into every battlefield in the world. Are we now going to decline to deliver his mail because he happens to live a little too far from the post office? This is not only false economy; it is, in my opinion, a breach of our duty to our farmer citizens. I grew up on a rural route and I know what this service means to the farmer. While we are worrying about every foreign nation on earth, I for one am going to insist on the development and extension of our rural free delivery service and our farm-to-market road program until every farmer in America has his mail delivered to his front gate.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2436) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 389, nays 0, not voting 43, as follows:

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father of the universe, we come to Thee, conscious of our own shortcomings, but with confidence and composure, knowing that having put our trust in Thee, our faith is well founded. May we tolerate nothing in our personal living which, if multiplied, would weaken our Nation. Teach us that our country is no better than its citizens, and no stronger than those in whom it puts its trust. So may we see ourselves as Thou dost see us, that being ashamed we may seek forgiveness, and knowing our weaknesses may accept Thy strength. With Thy blessing upon us, we need not fear decisions, nor hesitate to act. So use us, guide us, and act through us, we ask in Jesus' name and for His sake. Amen.

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"House Concurrent Resolution 11

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to terminate the powers granted to the executive branch of the Government to control the export of foods and agricultural products during the emergency arising from World War II

"Whereas the Congress of the United States granted to the executive branch of the Government unprecedented powers to control the export of foods and agricultural products during the emergency arising from the late war, which powers, being an unprecedented invasion of the liberties of a free people, were intended to be exercised during an extraordinary emergency; and

"Whereas such powers are still being exercised, notwithstanding the cessation of hostilities, to such an extent that nations who were our allies in the great conflict lately terminated, are forbidden to purchase the products of American agriculture, except through the agency and by the grace of the Executive power: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas (the senate concurring therein):

"SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to promptly terminate such extraordinary powers by the appropriate legislative action, to the end that the liberties of the people be no longer infringed and our allies permitted to obtain through the ordinary channels of commerce the agricultural products essential to their recovery from the devastating effects of such war.

"SEC. 2. The chief clerk of the house is instructed to furnish engrossed copies of this resolution to the appropriate officers of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to forward printed copies to United States Senators and Members of Congress elected from Kansas."

A resolution of the Assembly of the State of California; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"House Resolution 21

"Resolution relative to Federal loans for scheduled air lines

"Whereas there presently exists a grave financial crisis in the air-lines industry; and

"Whereas the people of California have a vital interest in economic development of this mode of transportation; and

"Whereas the State of California is most strategically located with regard to future enemy action and the continuance of a strong air transport system is vital to defense; and

"Whereas reconstitution of trade with the Orient may be materially hastened by adequate air transportation between the Pacific coast and the Far East; and

"Whereas the community of interest of large metropolitan as well as suburban communities in California can best be accomplished through air transportation and its sound economic growth, which is well illustrated by the relationship and transportation between the Capital City and the largest metropolitan areas in California; and

"Whereas the current financial problems of the scheduled air lines are the result of economic conditions created by the world conflict just completed and other causes beyond management control: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly of the State of California, That the Congress of the United States is respectfully memorialized to act favorably upon the recommendation of the President of the United States that Federal money be made available through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the scheduled air lines; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is respectfully petitioned to act favorably upon the applications of those air carriers entitled thereto for loans; and be it further Henderson, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"House Concurrent Resolution 1

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to grant immediate statehood to Hawaii

"Whereas the people of the Territory of Hawaii desire complete local self-government and parity in national government as a sovereign State in the Union; and

"Whereas the people of the Territory have demonstrated their capacity for self-government by their history as an incorporated territory of the United States of America; and

"Whereas the subcommittee of the Committee on the Territories of the House of Representatives, Seventy-ninth Congress, second session, after conducting a thorough study and investigation of the various questions and problems relating to the Territory, found the Territory and its people fully qualified for and entitled to statehood and recommended immediate consideration of legislation to admit Hawaii to statehood; and

"Whereas the President of the United States of America has endorsed statehood for Hawaii; and

"Whereas the Honorable Julius A. Krug, Secretary of the Interior, in a speech before a joint session of the two Houses of the Twenty-fourth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, reaffirmed the policy of the Department of the Interior to press the cause of statehood for Hawaii; and

"Whereas the people of the 48 States have indicated in national-opinion polls that they are in favor of statehood for Hawaii; and

"Whereas the Congress has before it a number of measures to provide statehood for Hawaii and its duly authorized committees will shortly hold hearings thereon: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-fourth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be and it is hereby requested and urged to grant immediate statehood to Hawaii and to enact appropriate legislation to grant statehood to Hawaii during the present session of the Congress; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska; to the Committee on Public Lands:

"House Joint Memorial 1

"To the Honorable Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the Honorable Julius A. Krug, Secretary of the Interior, and the Honorable E. L. Bartlett, Delegate from Alaska:

"Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in eighteenth regular session assembled, respectfully represents that:

"Whereas at a Territorial-wide referendum held on October 8, 1946, the people of Alaska voted approximately three to two in favor of statehood for Alaska; and

"Whereas the Treaty of Cession entered into with Russia on March 30, 1867, guarantees that all persons in the Territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of the citizens of the United States; and

"Whereas notwithstanding United States citizenship of the present-day population of Alaska, the rights of Alaskans are sorely circumscribed by existing Territorial status in that:

"They are subject to Federal taxes without voting representation in Congress, having paid income taxes to the United States in the neighborhood of $15,000,000 per year over the period of the last 4 years, and lesser sums during preceding years;

"They are denied the right to vote for President and to elect Members to the United States Senate and House of Representatives, notwithstanding the strategic location of Alaska from the standpoint of global affairs, and valiant service by Alaskans in two world wars;

"They cannot elect their own Governor and Lieutenant Governor, or establish their own system of courts;

"They cannot control their own natural resources, and in many other respects exercise the prerogatives of a State; and

"Whereas Alaskans in the exercise of local powers have established and maintained good schools, social-security programs and orderly conduct of Government affairs, and are qualified from the standpoints of both training and experience, to enter upon the responsibilities of statehood.

"Now, therefore, your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully urges that the Congress of the United States enact the Alaska statehood bill, H. R. 206, now before it or such other appropriate bill as may be advisable for the admission of Alaska as a State in the Union.

"And your memorialist will ever pray."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"House Joint Memorial 3

"To the President of the United States, to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, to the Attorney General, to the Postmaster General, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska:

"Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in eighteenth regular session assembled, respectfully represents that—

"Whereas on a night in December of the year 1940, the combined courthouse, jail, and Federal building at Valdez, Alaska, was totally destroyed by fire; and

"Whereas ever since the above occurrence, the town of Valdez and embracing area has been without adequate facilities for housing or maintaining prisoners and holding terms of the district court; and

"Whereas all pertinent records and valuable documents pertaining to the Department of Justice, Post Office Department, and other Federal agencies located at Valdez, are scattered throughout the town in various frame buildings, with a constant threat of fire endangering their safekeeping; and

"Whereas in replies to memorials sent them by the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Sessions of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General of the United States individually recognized the immediate necessity for a Federal building at Valdez, Alaska; and

"Whereas the reason given at those previous times for not being able to secure funds enabling the construction of said Federal building at Valdez, Alaska, was that all building appropriations had to be allocated for national defense purposes; and

"Whereas for all intents and purposes the great war is now ended and a more serious need than ever, owing to Alaska's rapid expansion, exists for such building.

"Now, therefore, your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully prays that the United States officers and Delegate from Alaska, to whom this memorial is submitted, lend their united effort toward obtaining a congressional appropriation enabling the construction of a combined courthouse, jail, and general Federal building at Valdez, Alaska, capable of housing the offices and records of all Federal agencies located there.

"And your memorialist will ever pray."

RESTORATION OF LITHUANIAN, LATVIAN, AND ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE—LETTER FROM THE LITHUANIAN-AMERICAN COUNCIL, INC.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD copy of a letter sent by the Lithuanian-American Council, Inc., of Chicago, Ill., to the Honorable Dean Acheson, Acting Secretary of State, requesting the Department of State to take proper steps for the restoration of the freedom and independence of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, whose neutrality has been violated by the Nazi-Soviet conspiracy in aggression.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1947.

The Honorable DEAN ACHESON,
Acting Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The Government of the United States, in a statement of July 23, 1940, denounced the crime of aggression against Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia which had been planned and perpetrated in consequence of the Ribbentrop-Molotov deal. That statement left no doubt regarding the identity of the state guilty of predatory activities by devious processes directed against the political independence and territorial integrity of the Baltic states. President Truman, as well as his illustrious predecessor in office, faithfully adhered to the aforesaid policy declaration, regardless of the temptations in the exigencies of war to abandon its stand.

Since July 23, 1940, nothing has happened which would justify the deliberately planned and executed aggression by the powerful Soviet Union against its friendly neighbors. Russia cannot adduce any plausible excuse for continuing its occupation of the Baltic states. She has no security, ethnographic, historic, economic, cultural, or any other grounds of justification. The continuing armed resistance to the Russian terror refutes any pretensions at the alleged self-expression of the indigenous populations in July 1940.

Unfortunately, the United States, the country which more than any other member of the United Nations made the military victory over the Axis Powers possible, has failed to extend a positive or effective help to victims of Soviet aggression. Russian occupation authorities are, in effect, emboldened by the passivity of this country and of the Western Powers in the face of the Soviet attempt to enjoy the fruits of the Nazi-Soviet conspiracy against peace and humanity—even though Russia's former partners have been justly punished by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. The Soviets apply the even harsher methods of oppression and annihilation of the indigenous Baltic populations and rob Russia's good Baltic neighbors of their material resources and manpower. Arrests, executions, and mass deportations for slave labor in Russia threaten to destroy the Baltic nations completely.

Under these circumstances, the mere denial of a juridical recognition of annexation of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, when not accompanied by positive action by the United States to back its stand, cannot avert the catastrophe. The longer such a situation is tolerated, the harder will it be to correct the consequences of an international crime.

Wherefore, the Lithuanian-American Council most urgently requests the Government of the United States to demand in an international forum, when occasion arises or presents itself, that all consequences of the Ribbentrop-Molotov division of spoils be nullified and that legal international order be restored in the Baltic countries.

We respectfully submit that one such occasion arises in connection with the Moscow Conference of Foreign Ministers of the great powers.

Although the problem of restoration of the legal order in the neutral Baltic states is said to be not on the agenda of that conference, the problem will unavoidably arise during the discussion of Germany's frontiers. In delineating the eastern frontier of Germany and in disposing of the claims of several nations to territories which have been Germany's prior to 1939, it is impossible to avoid mentioning the Reich's immediate neighbor, Lithuania.

It is respectfully submitted that the Moscow conference offers an opportunity for the United States delegation to insist that Lithuania be treated as an independent nation whose sovereign rights must be restored, in accordance with the Atlantic Charter which has been subscribed to by all the members of the original United Nations.

At the same time, we express our concern over the plans formulated at the Potsdam conference regarding the disposition of the territories of East Prussia. The Soviet proposal, tentatively approved at Potsdam, to annex Koenigsberg and the adjacent territory to Russia, if effected, would gravely imperil the security and freedom of the nations lying to the north of that area, and of Lithuania in the first place.

That proposal disregards completely the principles of the Atlantic Charter, President Truman's 12 points, and all historical, ethnographic, security, and economic considerations. No indigenous Russian population had ever been existent in East Prussia. In fact, the northern section of East Prussia, claimed by Russia, has been known for centuries past under the name of Lithuania Minor or Prussian Lithuania, and its official administrative designation during the long period of German domination had been, until recently, Lithuanian district of Lithuanian County. This section of East Prussia still preserves many Lithuanian characteristics in its place names, in the names of the inhabitants, and, to some extent, in their language. In the last quarter of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth century, the Lithuanian-speaking population of that area was numerous enough to elect its representatives to the Prussian Landtag and one deputy to the Reichstag. Koenigsberg, which lies just below the Lithuanian district, used to be the center of Lithuanian culture. In fact, the four hundredth anniversary of the first printed book in the Lithuanian language is observed this year; the Lithuanian Lutheran Catechism was published at Koenigsberg on January 8, 1547, for the use of the native population of East Prussia.

Consequently, Lithuania could have a more valid claim to the northern part of East Prussia which Russia claimed at Potsdam.

In the settlement of this problem, serious regard should be paid to historic, ethnographic, economic, and cultural considerations, the wishes of the indigenous inhabitants concerned, and the fundamental human rights. Some territorial adjustments in favor of the immediate neighbors might be justifiable, and some form of international status might be accorded to the port of Koenigsberg. But in no event should the East Prussian territory be allocated or annexed to Russia, which has assumed a treaty obligation to seek no self-aggrandizement, territorial or otherwise.

Most important of all, the rights and integrity of small and peaceful countries must be defended and restored. The long-suffering peoples of the neutral Baltic states still await their liberation, and it is our country's moral right and duty to insist on their liberation.

There is no reason why Lithuania and the other two Baltic Republics should be subjected, nearly 2 years after the cessation of hostilities in Europe, to an unspeakably brutal alien regime maintained by the armed might of one of our former allies.

Furthermore, there is no reason why the legitimate spokesmen for Lithuania—the duly accredited Minister at Washington and the Supreme Lithuanian Committee of Liberation—and the respective legitimate spokesmen for Latvia and Estonia, are or should be excluded from presenting in full their views and aspirations before the peace conference on Germany.

We entreat you, Mr. Secretary of State, to give your undivided attention and sympathetic consideration of the views presented herein. We ask you to speak up on behalf of the Government of the United States and to take proper steps for hastening the restoration of freedom and independence of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, whose neutrality has been brutally violated by the Nazi-Soviet conspiracy in aggression.

Respectfully submitted.

INDUSTRIAL AND LABOR RELATIONS—STATEMENT BY SENATOR IVES

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I have today introduced two bills and a joint resolution dealing with the problem of industrial and labor relations. Subsequently I issued a statement describing their contents in general. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate by reading a statement of that kind. I realize we have much business to do, and I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate unnecessarily. Therefore at this time I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the body of the RECORD the statement which I have prepared.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR IRVING M. IVES, OF NEW YORK

Today I have introduced in the Senate of the United States two bills and a joint resolution dealing with the problem of industrial and labor relations. These bills are based not alone on the testimony presented at the recent hearings held by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, but are also the result of 10 years of personal experience in dealing with the problems inherent in the relationship between management and labor.

The first bill would amend the National (Wagner) Labor Relations Act by providing for employers certain rights which should be basic in their relationship toward their employees.

It would definitely permit an employer to discuss with his employees any matter of mutual interest.

It would protect from the charge of an unfair labor practice any employer who refuses to bargain with his employees on the issue of the closed shop. No employer, however, would be prohibited from thus bargaining with his employees if he should choose to do so.

Under appropriate circumstances, an employer would be permitted to petition the Board for an election.

This bill defines certain unfair labor practices on the part of employees as follows:

Employees who might coerce their employer in the selection of his representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining or who might refuse to bargain collectively with their employer's duly designated representatives or who might conduct a strike or boycott for the purpose of preventing any employer from bargaining with the duly certified representatives of his employees or in order to force an employer to act in violation of his duty to bargain collectively, would be guilty of an unfair labor practice.

In order to be permitted to bargain collectively under the law, any labor organization would be required to file with its petition or charge a statement of the names and addresses of its officers and duly authenticated copies of its constitution and bylaws, and to establish to the satisfaction of the Board that financial reports for the preceding year had been made available for inspection by its members.

Under the second bill which I have introduced, a Federal mediation agency independent of the Department of Labor and under the direction of an Administrator would be created. In addition to performing all of the mediation and conciliation functions now being performed by the United States Conciliation Service, the agency would seek to avert or minimize possible labor disputes by preventive measures. Under the terms of this bill as much effort would be devoted to preventing the disease of industrial strife as to curing it.

By its terms a national labor-management panel, consisting of outstanding leaders of labor and management, would be established for the purpose of advising the Administrator in the prevention and solution of industry-wide disputes and other industrial controversies affecting the general welfare of the country.

Failure of mediation or voluntary arbitration to settle any serious labor dispute endangering the public health, safety, or welfare, would call for the establishment of a board of inquiry to make findings of fact—without recommendation—concerning the dispute and to report such findings to the President who might make them public. This type of fact-finding body, wherever it has been employed, has proved most successful in resolving differences between management and labor.

The third bill, which I have introduced, provides by joint resolution for the creation of a joint congressional committee on labor-management relations to be composed of six Members of the Senate and six Members of the House, with representation to be divided equally between the two major political parties. The relationship between management and labor has no place in partisan politics or as a partisan political issue and the bipartisan nature of the committee thus proposed would eliminate from the area of partisan politics the whole question of industrial and labor relations.

The function of this committee would be not only to conduct a thorough study and investigation of the entire field of industrial and labor relations, including the very complex problem of Nation-wide bargaining, but to consider specifically the effect on the labor-management relationship of existing laws and especially of the statutory changes which are likely to be enacted by the present session of the Congress. This committee would be required to report to the Congress not later than February 15, 1948, making such recommendations as its studies, surveys, and investigations would indicate to be advisable.

Although these proposed bills in no sense cover every aspect of industrial and labor relations where legislation might be employed, their enactment should go far toward removing the most serious obstacles which now prevent a desirable relationship between workers and employers and toward the attainment of that condition of mutual understanding and responsibility which are vital to happy industrial and labor relations.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ON LABOR RELATIONS PROGRAM

Mr. TAFT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 93), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act, approved March 1, 1907, the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to have printed for its use 1,000 additional copies of the hearings held before said committee during the Eightieth Congress on bills and joint resolutions relative to the labor relations program.

CREATION OR CHARTERING OF CERTAIN CORPORATIONS—RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 503, to establish and effectuate a policy with respect to the creation or chartering of certain corporations by act of Congress, and for other purposes, be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Judiciary Committee. A year ago a similar bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. Apparently now the Red Cross and other organizations are concerned about features of this bill. Therefore, I ask that it be returned to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill is recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EDUCATIONAL BENEFITS FOR VETERANS—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, Senate bill 855 to permit veterans receiving educational benefits under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, to receive subsistence allowance for dependents on account of brothers or sisters dependent because of minority or physical or mental incapacity, has been referred to the Senate Committee on Finance.

I suggest that the bill has been erroneously referred to the Committee on Finance, and that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

PRINTING OF REPORT OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF FEDERAL OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE TRUST FUND (S. DOC. NO. 18)

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, on January 3, 1947, pursuant to the provisions of section 201 (b) of the Social Security Act, the Federal Security Agency sent to the Senate the Seventh Annual Report of the Board of Trustees of the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund. The report involves a matter of very great importance and I think it should be available to all Members of the Senate. I, therefore, request that the report be printed as a Senate document with illustrations, as has been done heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INVENTORY OF NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, for a number of years I have been an advocate of taking a national inventory of our natural resources, particularly our mineral resources, as a matter of good business practice and good housekeeping, so that we may know where we stand. For about 3 years I have had a bill pending before the Congress which would provide for such an inventory. In the present Congress the number of this bill is S. 35.

In a recent issue of the magazine Pathfinder there appears an article entitled "Krug's Quest," which bears on this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that the article may be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KRUG'S QUEST

As Secretary of the Interior, charged with protecting and conserving the Nation's natural wealth, Julius A. (Cap) Krug wants to know what that wealth is.

Krug estimates the job would take 20 years, or longer than he expects to be Secretary, though it could be speeded up. He thinks it would be worth the $1,000,000,000 it would cost.

No such over-all inventory has ever been made. What information the Government has was gathered piecemeal, leaving large, unfilled gaps.

Krug points out that the war ate heavily into the known resources of strategic and critical materials, leaving the country with little or no idea of what shortages it might face in the event of another war. Present figures on metal reserves, he said, are meaningless.

URANIUM HUNT

Obviously, an important part of the job would be a search for additional and now unknown deposits of atomic materials.

Not only should the buried treasure be counted, but evaluated in dollars and cents, Krug says, so the country will know not only what it has but what it's worth. Only then will it know how much it must depend on foreign sources for what it needs.

Krug's recommendation, which finds support in earlier statements by President Truman, is only the latest in a series of such proposals.

Bills have frequently been offered in Congress for the purpose, but never got anywhere. This time it may be different.

Mr. McCARRAN. About the same time, there appeared in the magazine the United States News an article entitled "War's Cost in United States Materials: Dwindling Ores, Oil, Timber." This article also bears on the question of an inventory of our natural resources, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR'S COST IN UNITED STATES MATERIALS: DWINDLING ORES, OIL, TIMBER—FUTURE NEED TO GO FARTHER, DIG DEEPER, PAY MORE FOR BASIC GOODS—STIMULUS TO PRODUCTION OF SYNTHETICS—SUGGESTIONS FOR TIGHTER CONSERVATION

War's great cost to the United States is turning out to be its cost in natural resources, in the basic materials that support the Nation's strength.

Other nations spent more lives, lost more houses, factories and machines, and suffered more privations during wartime. None, however, spent more than a fraction of the metals, fuel, fibers, and soil resources that the United States spent to win the war.

A series of official reports is bringing to light the real extent of the war's cost in resources. These reports point to the conclusion that this country could not again fight a major war without drawing heavily upon resources from other, less exhausted parts of the world. Julius A. Krug, Secretary of Interior, is suggesting a $1,000,000,000 survey to determine exactly how much mineral wealth is left. The United States Forest Service is recommending tighter rules on use of the remaining timber resources. A committee of Congress investigating the oil outlook is worried about oil reserves.

These studies show that:

Metal resources are depleted to a great extent. The best-grade ores are gone, or nearly gone. More than 5,000,000,000 tons of United States minerals went into the war.

Oil resources as they are known today would be insufficient in another war. United States wells were tapped for about 8,000,000,000 barrels of oil in wartime, while all the rest of the world provided less than half as much. Even in this last war, in its closing months, United States wells could not keep up with the war's demands.

Timber stocks, after three centuries of abundance, are almost gone in some of the essential categories.

Soil resources suffered in wartime no greater loss, over all, than already is accepted as usual in peacetime. But certain areas were overcropped, now are nearing the status of wasteland.

Substitute resources actually were improved by pressure of war demand. A synthetic-rubber industry was built capable of turning out 1,000,000 tons of rubber a year. Using sea water and landlocked brines, magnesium output was lifted from 5,000,000 pounds to 375,000,000 pounds a year. Output of synthetic fibers and chemicals was multiplied, new sources discovered.

Unlimited use of natural wealth in this country was not matched anywhere else. Britain drew on her Empire overseas, but the take was limited. Germany exploited the rest of Europe. Russia got an important part of her raw materials from the United States. Japan drew on the Far East. Canada, with a relatively small industry, barely scratched the surface of her metals and oil deposits. Latin America supplied small, though essential, quantities of strategic materials.

A weaker position for the United States than before is a result of using its wealth without stint. Higher costs for raw materials are ahead. More goods are needed to feed, clothe, and equip a larger population. But the greater supplies must come from sources farther away, in many cases from overseas. United States resources can be expanded now only by digging deeper into the earth, by drawing metals from lower-grade ores, and by expanding synthetics. All these methods are being used and all are more expensive.

Iron ore is the most important case in point. The United States has more than enough iron ore for future needs. Proved reserves will last up to 111 years, as shown in the chart on page 25, and beyond that is a supply of usable ore that could last another 400 years. But the high-grade, low-cost ore of the Minnesota range may last less than 17 years. Vast Canadian deposits of good ore are near by, but they are buried far below the surface. Arguments are being made that the United States should start using its lower grade ore now, despite the higher costs, and save the readily available ore for emergencies.

Copper reserves are much nearer to exhaustion. The United States today gets about half its copper from abroad, mainly because its own deposits are progressively harder to mine. The shortage of copper explains the shortages of many electrical things that people want. The outlook is that copper production here can be maintained at its present rate of nearly 1,000,000 tons a year for about 10 years. A gradual decline to complete exhaustion will follow unless discoveries are made, and large new discoveries are not expected.

Lead and zinc deposits have only a few more years to last at current rates. Despite strenuous efforts to find more, the United States mines that once led the world turn out only about half as much metal as they did 20 years ago. The result is a factor in the scarcity of good paint, in lower-quality gasoline for motorcars, higher prices for many household goods.

Other metal deposits have been skimmed of their cream. For years the United States has had to go to the rest of the world for its needs in chromite, graphite, industrial diamonds, nickel, quartz crystals, and tin. Now the United States also must depend on foreign shipments for more than half its needs for antimony, asbestos, manganese, mica, platinum metals, and tungsten. United States mines furnish only slightly more than half of the Nation's supplies of bauxite for aluminum, of cadmium, mercury, and potash. There is less than a 20-year reserve of 20 essential minerals. That is why military stock piling of strategic materials is beginning in earnest after many years' neglect of that program.

Oil tops the list of natural resources that can be replaced eventually by substitutes. Yet depletion of United States natural oil resources is serious enough now to touch off a fight for control of the oil lands under the United States seacoast and to bring increasing Government support behind United States companies in their search for oil abroad. Outlook for natural oil is this:

The United States is believed to be good for about 100,000,000,000 barrels of oil before the last well is drilled. About one-third has been used already. Proved reserves reached a peak of 24,500,000,000 barrels in 1938. Since then discoveries have fallen off. The war drained off about 2 percent of the reserves, leaving a known supply that might last through 1964 with no new discoveries. On the basis of the most optimistic expectations as to discoveries, the United States is expected to be more than half dependent on foreign sources for oil by 1970 and on synthetics from tar sand, oil shale, and coal.

These sources are almost unlimited. They already are being squeezed for oil content in experimental and pilot-plant operations. In 2 years' time the cost of making gasoline from the substitute materials has been reduced from 18 cents a gallon to between 7 and 10 cents a gallon. Gasoline from natural oils costs about 5 cents a gallon.

Timber scarcities are growing, according to the United States Forest Service, at a time when the United States needs more lumber than ever before for housing and other buildings, more pulpwood for paper and synthetic materials.

The Nation has only a little more than half as much saw timber as 37 years ago. The annual drain of saw timber is 53,900,000,000 board-feet, while annual growth is only 35,300,000,000 board-feet. The loss is greatest in certain of the most-needed types of timber.

The Forest Service estimates that national safety requires an annual new growth of timber equal to 20,000,000,000 cubic feet of wood. That is 70 percent more than is being grown now. Cutting practices on 65 percent of the privately owned forest land are classed as poor to destructive, and improvement is expected to be slow.

Land conservation was extended during the war, but the United States has not yet turned the corner toward a net gain rather than loss in soil resources. About 500,000 acres of tillable land is lost yearly to erosion.

A total of 360,000,000 acres of land is under cultivation. Not more than 100,000,000 additional acres could be made productive by draining and reclamation. About 90 percent of the cultivated land needs erosion protection, but less than a third has had any conservation treatment.

Yet more progress has been made toward saving soil than in many other programs aimed at conserving resources. The United States still wastes each year enough natural gas, for instance, to provide as much power as Britain uses in a year. All signs point to increasing efforts to conserve the oil, steel, wood and other natural riches that have been found necessary for industrial and military security.

NOMINATION OF DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr McMAHON. Mr. President, at page 1078 of the RECORD of February 17, 1947, there appears an article entitled "What's the Rush?" by Frank C. Waldrop. I quote from that article:

> Mr. Baruch's mistake lay in his failure to say in public what he had been saying in private about the President's choice for head of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, David E. Lilienthal.

Knowing, of course, that the statement quoted was not true, and in order that the record might be kept straight in respect to this matter, I wrote to Mr. Baruch. I ask unanimous consent that my letter and Mr. Baruch's reply thereto be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 21, 1947.

Mr. BERNARD BARUCH,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. BARUCH: I realize that it would be impossible for either you or myself to keep up with everything the newspaper columnists say about us.

If it were not for the fact that Senator McKELLAR has seen fit to introduce the enclosed articles by Frank Waldrop in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would not bother to write you about it.

However, you will note that Mr. Waldrop purports to state that you spoke quite differently about Mr. Lilienthal in our executive session than you did in the open session.

Since this does not coincide with my recollection, I thought you might wish to advise me so that I might straighten out the record—this in justice to both Mr. Lilienthal and yourself.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

BRIEN McMAHON,
United States Senator.

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 9, 1947.

Hon. BRIEN McMAHON,
United States Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR McMAHON: Answering your letter of February 21, of course, I didn't say anything different in the executive session from what I said publicly.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

FOREIGN MINISTERS' CONFERENCE AT MOSCOW

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to an article written by Andrew Bernhard, managing editor of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, reporting from Moscow, under date of March 10. I should like to read two short paragraphs from his news story:

It will be well for American readers to remember as the conference proceeds that meetings of the foreign ministers are secret and that reports coming to you from them are sifted through authorized spokesmen for each delegation who make round-up statements after each session.

It is possible that correspondents may yield to a human weakness for inside information and speculation, and occasionally may allow themselves considerable latitude for interpretation, often just a two-dollar word for guessing. If that is remembered, possibly American readers won't be too alarmed or too exuberant over developments here and will remain calm though the conference is likely to be difficult in view of the enormous problems to be settled.

I recommend those two paragraphs, written by Mr. Bernhard from Moscow, to the consideration of the Senate.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the following amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] to the committee amendment beginning on page 1, line 10, namely:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by the committee in lines 4 to 12 on page 2, insert the words:

No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I send to the desk a proposed substitute for the second committee amendment, which is the pending question, and ask that it be received and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment in the nature of a substitute will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to announce to my associates in the Senate that, following the suggestions made the other day, conferences have been proceeding and I understand that more or less of an agreed basis has been arrived at among Senators who the other day did not agree. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and other Senators have been doing yeoman work in this respect. I understand the more or less agreed basis is set forth in the amendment just submitted by the Senator from Ohio, which reads as follows:

No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than 2 years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this article shall not apply to any person now holding the office of President, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Mr. President, what this language does is to adopt substantially the suggestion made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] on the floor the other day. The committee amendment provided in substance that one who had held the Presidential office less than a year could be elected to two terms, and if he had held the office more than 1 year he could be elected to only one term. The suggested amendment, as I understand it, proposes that if the person occupying the office had not held it for more than 2 years of the term of his predecessor he would be eligible to two elective terms, and thus in effect could remain in the office for practically 10 years. If, however, the individual succeeding to the Presidency should hold the office for more than 2 years of the Presidential term he would be limited to the portion of the term thus served and one elective term.

The suggested amendment, as I understand, is not to apply to President Truman, who now holds the office as former Vice President.

I should like, if possible, to facilitate action on this measure. I think the country is entitled to have an opportunity to vote on this question, which for a century and a half in greater or less degree has been agitating the electorate. I make this explanation at this time because the pending amendment is the Magnuson amendment, and I think it should be voted down so that we may have an opportunity to vote on the suggested amendment.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. As I understand, the only difference between the suggested amendment and the committee amendment is that the minimum length of time a President might serve would be 6 years instead of 5 years. In other words, the proposed amendment simply adds 1 year.

Mr. WILEY. No. If he went into office shortly after the death of the President he could serve 7.9 years.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Under the proposed amendment a man could always serve as much as 6 years, and he might serve for as much as 10 years. That is the proposal.

Mr. ELLENDER. But under the terms of the committee amendment he could serve a minimum of 5 years and a maximum of 8 years and a fraction of a year.

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Therefore, what is proposed is to increase the time by 1 year over the provision contained in the committee amendment.

Mr. TAFT. There is a difference of 1 year.

On the other hand, the proposed amendment of the Senator from Washington might permit a man to serve 12 years if the President should die between the date of the election and the date of his inauguration. I thought that was too much.

The other provision in the suggested amendment is as follows:

But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the time within which this article becomes operative, from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Thus it would except President Truman, in order that there may be no in personam legislation under the circumstances.

I believe that the language of the suggested amendment is somewhat clearer than the language of the committee amendment. The suggested amendment reads in part as follows:

No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President or acted as President for more than 2 years of a term to which some other person was elected President, shall be elected to the office of the President more than once.

It seems to me that that is a somewhat clearer statement than the language of the committee amendment. So I hope the Senate may be willing to vote down the amendment of the Senator from Washington, if he wishes to press it. If it is voted down, I shall offer this proposed substitute for the second committee amendment. I understand that it is agreeable to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MAGNUSON obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I know that some Senators on both sides of the Chamber are rather inclined to believe that we should attemept to enact into constitutional law the Washington tradition, and that to that end the amendment should apply to prevent a man being elected President for more than two successive terms. I wonder if the Senator from Washington would agree to modify his amendment, or to reframe it, so as to have it provide, in effect, that—

No person shall be eligible to be elected to the office of President for more than two successive terms.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I may say that I have discussed this question with the Senator from Florida and other Senators on this side of the aisle. I am perfectly willing to accept that language. I think it perfects the amendment and makes the issue much clearer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Chair to understand that the Senator perfects his amendment as indicated?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is so perfected.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, at the close of the last session the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] suggested that we might be able to arrive at some compromise on this question. This morning the Senator from Ohio submitted to me a proposed amendment which he wishes to offer as a substitute for my amendment. I have read it very carefully and discussed it with other members on this side of the aisle. I should like very much to accept it. However, in my opinion, it does not reach the evil which the proponents of the amendment say they wish to eliminate. When we deal in that manner with a Vice President or other person who succeeeds to the Presidency we penalize a man for holding an office which he assumes because of conditions beyond his control. If there is an evil in connection with Presidential succession, it is the evil of a man deliberately using his office to be reelected by the people for many successive terms. Personally, I think the people should have the right to pass upon that question. But if there is an existing evil, the Taft substitute would penalize a man who happened to be Vice President, Secretary of State, or the holder of any other office in the line of succession, and prevent him from running twice for the Presidency if something should happen which would cause him to assume the duties of President during the course of a Presidential term. I feel that the least we can do is to permit the people to vote for him once and say, "This man is to be our President," and if he does a good job, permit the people to endorse him again. That is the only alleged evil against which the proponents of the measure are striking. I should like to accept the substitute of the Senator from Ohio; but in view of the perfecting language suggested by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], I should like to have a vote on my amendment as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, as modified.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. In effect, the amendment originally offered by the Senator from Washington provided that a person might serve at least 8 years in the Presidency, but under the amendment, before it was perfected, it was possible for him to serve as much as 12 years less 1 day. The Senator has modified his amendment so that, in effect, not only could a person serve in the Presidency for 12 years minus 1 day, but after the interim of another term he could come back and serve for another 12 years.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is correct.

Mr. REVERCOMB. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the able Senator does not serve the purpose of any amendment whatever on this subject. The purpose is not to bar a person from holding office. It seems to me that the principal purpose is to preserve government and protect it against extended tenure of office.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The modification suggested by the Senator from Florida merely breaks the line of succession. It has been suggested on this side of the aisle that there are many young men in politics. I do not know whether the wish is father to the thought; but a very young man might be elected to the Presidency. He might be elected twice; and later, after an interim of 8 or 12 years, or even a greater period of time, the people might want him again. The reason I accepted the amendment was that so many Senators had expressed the same idea.

Mr. REVERCOMB. It seems to me that the Senator's argument is based upon the very evil which the amendment originally proposed was intended to cure. A man might serve for 12 years, and after an interruption of 4 years might serve for another 12 years.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I would call it an alleged evil.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], as modified.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington is greatly preferable to that suggested by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, in two particulars.

First, under the amendment to which I refer as the Taft amendment, it seems to me that persons who have acquired experience in serving as President, but who came into office through misfortune or misadventure, having served as Vice President and having succeeded in the case of the death of the President, would be unduly penalized.

I invite attention to the fact that under the so-called Taft amendment, if it had been in effect in 1912 when former President Theodore Roosevelt ran for another term, he would have been ineligible to offer himself as a candidate for the Presidency. He had served, including the time he had served in the McKinley term and the time he had served in the term for which he himself was elected, more than 6 years. He would have been ineligible to have been considered a candidate for election again to the Presidency.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have to ask the Senator from Florida to suspend in order that we may keep our date with destiny.

The Senate will now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives, and will reassemble in its chamber immediately at the conclusion of the joint meeting of the two Houses.

Thereupon, at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m., the Senate, preceded by its Secretary (Carl A. Loeffler), its Sergeant at Arms (Edward F. McGinnis), and the President pro tempore, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear a message from the President of the United States.

(The message of the President of the United States this day delivered by him to the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress appears at p. 1980 of the proceedings of the House of Representatives in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The joint meeting of the two Houses having been dissolved, the Senate reassembled in its chamber at 1 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m., and was called to order by the President pro tempore.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I shall not take many minutes of the time of the Senate on the matter which I am discussing. I do not discuss it from a partisan standpoint, from a political standpoint, or for any purpose other than to simplify and clarify the issue presented by the proposed constitutional amendment so that when it is submitted, if it be submitted, to the people of the United States, they will be afforded an opportunity acting by States, to decide whether they want to continue the Washington tradition, as it is known and referred to as a tradition, or to enact it into law, by writing it into the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, at the time the Senate recessed to go to the Hall of the House of Representatives I had mentioned one of the reasons why I felt that the amendment as reported by the committee, as well as the form of amendment suggested by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, would depart very greatly from the Washington tradition, in that it would affect so differently Vice Presidents who succeeded to the Presidency from the way in which Presidents themselves would be affected.

I called attention to the fact that if this amendment had been a part of the Constitution at the time when the late President Theodore Roosevelt, one of our greatest Americans, was endeavoring to be elected again to the Presidency in 1912 because he thought, as millions of others thought, that there was work for him to do, he would not have been eligible to become a candidate in that particular election. I do not think that would have been good or sound.

I call attention to the fact that if at the end of his first full elective term President Coolidge, himself another great American whom I honor, had felt, and if a sufficient number of the American people had felt, that the emergencies of the situation and the critical nature of the conditions at that time demanded that he should again stand for the Presidency and be reelected to the Presidency, he would have been ineligible.

I call attention to the fact that but for specific provisions exempting the present occupant of the White House, the same situation would exist with reference to him. While I appreciate the courtesy which lies behind the proposed exception, and I consider it to be a generous gesture, yet I do not think the amendment will commend itself to the public to any greater extent because of the fact that it makes an exception with reference to the present occupant of the White House. If, however, the proposed amendment were adopted, in the last year and three-quarters of the 7-year period in which its ratification may be considered, it would apply in a different way to the then occupant of the White House, whoever he might be, unless he continued to be the present occupant of the White House. I do not think it sound to suggest the submission of a constitutional amendment which might apply in different ways to two individuals serving in the period of time within which the amendment will be considered by the people of the various States of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Does the Senator wish to make the legislation retroactive, and change the conditions which now exist? Is that his argument?

Mr. HOLLAND. No. My position is that the unwisdom of the adoption of the amendment at this time may be clearly demonstrated by indicating how it would have worked if applied to actual conditions through which this Nation has lived in the past.

My first point is that if it had been applied to the late former President Theodore Roosevelt it would have prevented his becoming a candidate in 1912. It would have prevented President Coolidge from becoming a candidate at the time he chose not to run, which, of course, was his privilege. My next point was that, as presented, the proposed substitute amendment of the distinguished Senator from Ohio might apply differently to two different occupants of the White House during the period of 7 years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. If the Senator will again yield, his last point is the one to which I am addressing my inquiry.

Mr. HOLLAND. Let me read the provision of the proposed substitute amendment of the distinguished Senator from Ohio:

> But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the time within which this article becomes operative, from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

I think it is quite clear that under the last clause which I have just read, a completely different rule would be applicable to an occupant of the White House serving in the years 1949 to 1952, inclusive, if that individual were a person other than the present occupant of the White House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I am trying to find out whether the Senator wishes to change the law so as to make it retroactive and make it affect someone who may occupy the office before the legislation is finally ratified and adopted by the Nation. Does the Senator wish to change the existing situation?

Mr. HOLLAND. No. My suggestion is that the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] will simplify and clarify the joint resolution and make it, in effect, a statement of the Washington tradition by eliminating any question whatsoever except the eligibility of a person to be elected President for more than two successive terms. It would eliminate all the hair-splitting questions as to whether or not a Vice President succeeding to the office of President has served a few days less or a few days more, or whether a former Vice President who is now serving as President is affected in a different way from another who might be serving even within the period of time within which this amendment will be considered by the people of the several States of the Nation.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I merely wish to invite the attention of the Senator to the difference between President Truman and any man who may occupy his position in the future. In the case of President Truman, when he ran for Vice President there was no limitation, and it seems to me that that differentiates him from a man who knows when he runs for Vice President that if the President dies in the first 2 years of his term he can serve for only 6 years. In other words, as to President Truman, the law would be retroactive except for this amendment. That was one of the reasons why I was glad to propose that change. On the other hand, as to men who choose in the future to run for Vice President, they will know exactly what is before them. They will know that if the President lives for 2 years and then dies, they may possibly be President for 10 years if they are reelected twice. If he dies within the first 2 years of his term, they know that they can serve for only 6 years.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the fairness of the Senator, and I think he should be commended for it. However, I invite his attention to the fact that the proposed wording goes a great deal further than his suggestion, because it would not merely permit the present occupant to serve two full terms plus the remainder of the term in which he is now serving, but it would operate so as to place no limitation whatsoever upon his right to run, whereas it would operate entirely differently as to someone else who might succeed him during the period of 7 years, and would operate still differently in the case of someone who might fill the post after the actual adoption of this amendment, if it should be adopted.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The able Senator has well pointed out the many ramifications and possibilities which might occur when we attempt to limit the succession and Presidential terms beyond the Presidency itself, and attempt to deal with the Vice Presidency, or some other office in the line of succession. As the Senator has suggested, what those who proposed this measure are trying to do is to keep a man from deliberately using his office to be reelected for too many terms. This provision might apply to three different men in three different ways in 7 years.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator is correct.

I am sensible of the fact that there is sentiment in this Nation as to the wisdom or unwisdom of engrafting the Washington tradition upon the Constitution. What I should like to do would be to give to the American people a clear opportunity to decide for themselves whether they prefer to continue the tradition as such, electing to decide in their own wisdom from time to time whether any person should have more than two terms, or whether, instead, they prefer to place such a provision in the Constitution.

When it came to the floor of this body, I was disturbed because of what seemed to me, although my judgment may be wrong about the matter, to be three trouble-making provisions. The first was the one requiring submission to conventions, which it seemed to me would not be economical, and which might result in the amendment not being ratified simply because of a failure to call the conventions, if in as many as 13 State legislatures there were politically minded people who could prevent calling of them. But, above all, it seemed to me that it would call for a period of political harangue, political discussion, and political convulsion which I think would be inappropriate in the particular times through which we are now passing. So I am glad the Senate has omitted that provision. Two other provisions of the measure now before the Senate I believe to be objectionable—and I make this point without any question as to their being based on partisan politics or anything of the kind. One of them, which I have already mentioned, is with reference to its effect upon Vice Presidents. The other, which I shall now mention briefly, is that both the original joint resolution and the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the distinguished Senator from Ohio would so operate, I think, under the conditions stated in the amendment, as to make a person entirely ineligible for reelection, even though he might not have served in the immediate past as President of the United States.

Mr. President, if I correctly understand the demand which has persisted for so many years that the Washington tradition be engrafted upon the Constitution, it has been upon the basis that a President might adopt a course which would be calculated to keep him in office, and might build up political machinery which would enable him to be reelected. If that be the objection and if that be a sound argument for the submission to the people of a constitutional amendment based on the Washington tradition, and if they are in favor of writing it into the Constitution, I submit that the objective is met entirely by the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Washington; for, if that amendment were agreed to, it would operate only to prevent succession in office after a President had served two full terms.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these are troublous times. We have just heard an address delivered by the President, who, I am sure, had the sympathy of every one of us, regardless of how we may decide upon the momentous issues with which he was dealing. Everything he said and everything in connection with that historic occasion at the other end of the Capitol, from which we have just returned, served to accentuate the fact that we are living in difficult times and will continue so to live for many years in the future.

I call the attention of the Senate, without applying it particularly to either one party or the other, to the fact that young men, brilliant men, able statesmen, are now offering themselves or are being suggested by others as candidates for the Presidency. Indeed, they are so young that if they served for eight full years, as would be provided if the Washington tradition were written into the Constitution, they would still be in their late forties or their early fifties and would still be available to the call of the Nation after having returned to civil life for 4 years.

Mr. President, with our knowledge of the fact that this is becoming a young man's world and the actual fact that young men of proved ability and high qualities of leadership are offering and are available for the Presidency, I do not think we should adopt a course which would preclude recalling, after a vacation, such a young man who has been ripened and matured by the experience of 8 years in the White House, if there were great need for him.

Personally, I hope to vote for this amendment, and I shall do so if the amendment of the Senator from Washington is adopted; but I want to say to the distinguished Senators who favor this amendment that they are simply adding additional objections which will make for further difficulty in connection with the consideration of the amendment by the people of the States, if they insist upon the Taft substitute. I hope, Mr. President, that the issue may be clarified, may be simplified, and may be submitted as merely one proposition so that we may ascertain whether the people of the Nation wish to have the Washington tradition remain such, or want it included in the Constitution of the United States.

Reference has been made several times in the course of this debate to provisions of State constitutions which prevent succession to the governorship after either one term or two terms or three terms. There may be others, but I am familiar with these three different requirements in various States.

I call attention to the fact that in no case, if we make that comparison, have the people of a sovereign State ruled that a man who has served them as governor shall become by reason of that fact ineligible to ever succeed to that responsibility or to ever be called to lead them again in the governor's chair, whereas the result of this amendment as offered by the committee and of the substitute amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Ohio would be to render persons of experience, of high, proved qualities, ability, and courage, wholly ineligible, regardless of conditions and regardless of their age and strength.

I call attention to the fact that we have right here in the Senate men who have served as governors of their States and who have taken the enforced vacations which were provided for under the constitutions of their respective States, and then have been called back to serve again as governors. Out of the abundance of material which is going to be produced by this Nation in the future, and which is already being produced—and I can look at both sides of this Chamber and see able Senators who would come within that classification—I think we shall have young men offering for the Presidency and, at times, elected to the Presidency. So, I should hate to see a limitation imposed which would prevent the Nation from having the same advantage which the States have insisted upon having for themselves in reference to the governorship; that is, the advantage of calling back if need be, if occasion required, if there were a critical, crucial time which demanded the service of a person of proved worth and experience, who had manifested his ability to do a particular job, I should hate to have the Nation put in the position that such a person could not be called back to the Presidency.

I realize that the same argument applies in lesser degree to continuation in office after 8 years; but I think that the lay citizens who really urge this amendment want the American people to have an opportunity to determine whether the Washington tradition shall be fixed in the Constitution or whether it shall remain merely a tradition. There will be plenty of controversy, plenty of differences of opinion upon that point, and it will not be on partisan lines or on a wholly political basis. It will be founded in the soundest, most patriotic thinking our people can apply to it. I hope that is the kind of measure which will emerge from this debate.

It is my strong hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] may prevail, so that this proposed constitutional amendment may then be submitted to the people of the United States and so that they may have an opportunity to say, after understanding what it is that they are called upon to decide, whether the Washington tradition shall remain simply that, or whether it is best, in their judgment, to engraft it upon the Constitution itself.

The inclusion of all these other factors is trouble making and will disturb the impartial consideration of the amendment, and in my judgment will tend to defeat it.

Let us give it a fair chance, and let the people say whether they want the Washington tradition to remain as such or whether they wish it to become a part of our fundamental law.

And the Senate agree to the same.

STYLES BRIDGES,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for immediate consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I should like to make inquiry with respect to amendment No. 19, which provides for the liquidation of the Civilian Production Administration. When the chairman of the Appropriations Committee spoke before the Senate the other day, I understood him to say that this provision could be carried out by the transfer to the Housing Expediter of the functions now performed by the Civilian Production Administration with respect to the allocation of materials for veterans' housing.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. The question then arises: How will the Housing Expediter have the funds with which to carry on that work? Does the Senator from New Hampshire know whether he has available appropriations?

Mr. BRIDGES. If the Housing Expediter does not have the necessary funds with which to carry on when he virtually takes back these duties, which originally were his, of course he will have to ask for specific funds for that purpose. My understanding is that he has some general funds available.

Mr. HAYDEN. Then if he can find in his general funds sufficient money with which to perform this service, it will be entirely proper for him to do so, and I understand it is the intent of Congress that he use the money for that purpose.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is my understanding, and I think that is the intent of the committee and of the Congress in so acting.

Mr. HAYDEN. I simply wish to clear up that point, because I do not want to have develop a situation whereby after the function is taken away from the Civilian Production Administration and transferred to the Housing Expediter, the Housing Expediter will be without funds to carry it on. If he can find the money, he is supposed to do that. If he cannot, he is supposed to ask Congress for it. Is that correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. With respect to amendment No. 15, which relates to the Office of Price Administration, I should like to make a few remarks.

The House provided for a rescission of $9,000,000—in other words, that the funds already available, and which would have remained available to the Office of Price Administration, be reduced by $9,000,000. The Senate restored the $9,000,000. The conference report, as I understand it, makes a rescission of $2,000,000. The budget estimate under which this matter was considered requested not only that the funds of the Office of Price Administration be not disturbed, but asked for $5,500,000 in order that it might carry on its activities, particularly those with respect to rent control and sugar rationing, until the 30th of June.

Thus the conference report provides, instead of any additional money with which to carry on this function, $7,051,752 to pay terminal leave. In other words, it contemplates that between now and the 30th of June, practically all the employees of the Office of Price Administration shall be discharged and shall be paid terminal leave out of this money. Am I correct about that?

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator's statement is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. It is perfectly obvious to me that it is impossible to operate and to liquidate an agency at the same time. The best information I can get from it is that instead of attempting to do anything of that kind, the Office of Temporary Controls, under which the functions of the old Office of Price Administration are to be carried on, will attempt to administer rent control and sugar rationing until the 30th day of next month—that is to say, for another 6 weeks—and then for the remaining 60 days it will devote its time exclusively to liquidation, because it is impossible to liquidate and to operate at the same time. That is perfectly obvious to me.

That being the case, the Senate and the House of Representatives are faced with the absolute necessity within the next 6 weeks of enacting legislation to continue rent control, if it is to be continued, and to continue sugar rationing, if it is to be continued. If there are two "must" bills, one is a bill which must be reported to the Senate, pass the Senate, pass the House of Representatives, and be signed by the President within the next 6 weeks, to take care of rent control; and another one dealing with sugar rationing must be reported to the Senate and go through the same procedure and become a law between now and the 30th day of next month, or else there will be no sugar rationing and no rent control.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. It is perfectly obvious that there will be no sugar rationing, anyway, unless the Congress enacts a bill by the 31st of this month. We propose to pass such a bill by the 31st of this month. As I understand the proposal, sugar rationing and all sugar control will be transferred to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. TAFT. So all that part of the OPA can be dismissed after the 1st of April, except for closing up the offices.

So far as rent control is concerned, I certainly hope a rent-control bill may be passed by the 1st of April. Measures are being taken to see that such a bill is pressed to prompt and immediate enactment.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am glad to hear that, because it is perfectly obvious, when considering the amount of money which is now available, that neither of those functions can be carried on for more than approximately 6 weeks.

Mr. BRIDGES. Let me say to the Senator that I differ with him in regard to that assumption. I do not see why the OPA cannot start scaling down now, and why it cannot gradually level off to zero by June 30, and still perform all the duties it is called upon to perform, certainly until June 30. That is a difference of opinion, but I think the OPA can do it.

When the OPA says that there will not be rent control or sugar control after March 31 or, rather, April 30, I think the OPA is adopting a very arbitrary attitude. By cutting down their surplus help and operating on a rock-bottom basis, I think there is no reason why they cannot continue this particular work. Of course, they would not have the lush manner of performing their duties which they had for the last few years, but they could do it on a sound basis. Their duties are very simple in respect to rent control and sugar rationing and rice, which are the only other matters involved; and it seems to me they could do it without suffering themselves or without having the country suffer.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am merely expressing my judgment in regard to what I think a businessman who was given certain things to do—for instance, such things as rent control—would say. It is impossible to liquidate the offices all over the United States and at the same time administer rent control. I am simply saying how important it is that this legislation covering the items mentioned be enacted promptly, for otherwise, on the basis of the amount of money now to be appropriated, we shall know that in 6 weeks those functions must cease.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I dislike this procedure of killing off agencies by refusing them money before legislative committees of the Senate have had a chance to pass upon the matter. I wish to be recorded as voting "no" on this measure.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to have the RECORD clearly express the same sentiment on my part. It is an anomalous situation that now, through the indirect means of appropriation legislation, we are about to cut down a certain agency, and yet, if I correctly understand, a standing committee of the Senate has recommended that that agency be extended for another year. So it is proposed that, by indirection, through the appropriation function, on the recommendation of one committee, this action shall be taken, and then from another committee is to come, as I understand, a recommendation that, through permanent legislation, rent control be extended for a year. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. BRIDGES. The idea and purpose of the appropriation is to end appropriations for the OPA on June 30 and to completely rid the Nation of OPA. We are not trying to cut out rent control. If the Congress deems it wise to continue rent control, it will be continued. Personally, I think it is necessary to continue rent control, but I think we should continue it in some other agency of Government, rather than to continue the OPA which has been an outstanding sore thumb of the Nation for the last 3 or 4 years.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me make a further inquiry: Is not the effect of what the Senator's committee has done and what the Senate is now asked to do, that for all practical purposes rent control shall stop on April 30 and the money remaining shall be expended in the liquidation of the agency from April 30 to June 30, whereas the regular legislation on the subject provides that rent control—meaning presumably effective rent control—shall last until June 30? So we are, by indirection, by the limitation of an appropriation, actually going contrary, it seems to me, to the permanent legislation respecting rent control which is now on the statute books, and contrary to the recommendation of the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has already recommended, according to the press, that by permanent legislation rent control be extended for another year.

I am wondering what position we will be in when the bill the Banking and Currency Committee acted on comes to the floor. I take it we will have to order our appropriation machinery in such a way as to adjust ourselves to that concept, which contemplates the continuation of rent control for another year from June 30, as against the concept of the committee to limit rent control effectively until April 30 of this year.

Mr. BRIDGES. Let me say that I do not by any means believe other than that with the funds allowed it OPA can carry on rent control up to June 30. It will have to be done on a scaling-down basis, as should be the case, and what is suggested seems to be the only way to bring that about. As various Senators have said, if OPA wanted to do so—though I do not think they should—they could continue on in full force until April 30, and then they could spend the next 60 days in liquidation. I do not think that is the intent of the committee. I think the intent of the committee and of the Congress is that they should now so scale down their activities that the work of OPA may be in the process of liquidation, that their duties will continue up to June 30, and that it is the problem of Congress to take care of rent control after that. Personally, I think rent control should be continued, but I do not think it should be continued in OPA.

Mr. HAYDEN. The intent of the committee is that they shall do an impossible thing.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. PEPPER. The conference report also provides, does it not, for the termination of the authority of the Civilian Production Administration to allocate building materials, for example, to the veterans' housing program, for all effective purposes, up to March 31, as General Fleming said it would when we were considering the matter here on the floor?

Mr. BRIDGES. In effect, that agency will be liquidated as of June 30, and there again it is a question of handling funds. It is not the idea of the committee to end the allocation of these materials if it is wise to continue it, because this duty was given the CPA, or the Office of Temporary Controls, by a directive of the Housing Expediter, and all that will happen will be that the Expediter who gave the directives to CPA to continue the work will automatically assume the task, if it is to be continued further.

Mr. PEPPER. Are any funds to be made available to the Housing Expediter with which to discharge those functions?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; but I understand the Housing Expediter has some funds available to take this matter over, and if it is necessary to give him more funds through a deficiency bill, certainly the committee will consider that. The desire is to end OPA, and to end CPA, and if it shall seem necessary to continue the functions of rent control and allocation of materials, we want them continued under an agency in which we have more confidence than we have in the existing agencies.

Mr. PEPPER. It seems to me very obvious that those who occupy the homes are being caught in a squeeze. Rent control, for all practical purposes, is going to end April 30, and rationally so, for this is a kind of enforcement which, if not done well, had better not be done at all. As a matter of fact, the agency has not had sufficient personnel to do the job as it should have been done. In nearly every city in my State where rent control is in progress, we have been bombarded by landlords trying to get adjustments of rentals, and not able to get service through the OPA agency because it did not have the personnel with which to do the job.

Mr. President, if we cut the personnel further, it will simply mean that we had better not have any rent control, because there will be black marketing, there will be violations without enforcement of penalties, and it will be a case like prohibition again, when it would have been better not to have tried the little enforcement that was attempted.

On the one hand we are for all practical purposes removing the protection of rent control from the people who occupy rental property as homes, when, on the other hand, we could channel building materials through the housing program, at least the veterans' housing program, into the building of a greater number of veterans' homes, and offer an alternative home to a veteran who has to move out of a residence for which he cannot pay the required rent, when the landlord raises the rent. Instead of our putting the building materials more into that program, now it is proposed to take away that control, that help, which could result in putting building materials into the veterans' home-building program. We are, therefore, curtailing the available homes, on the one hand, and putting a real squeeze upon those who occupy homes, on the other.

Mr. President, I do not think that is good public policy, and, like the Senator from Idaho, I want to be recorded as expressing my opposition to the penuriousness we are exhibiting in these appropriation reductions.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, all I wish to say in answer to the Senator from Florida is that sometimes he could touch me, or could move me, by some of his very eloquent pleas, but certainly when he pleads, as spokesman for the administration, that there is not adequate personnel in Government bureaus, I cannot say his argument impresses me greatly, because that is one place where there is plenty of personnel.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am not saying that in every agency there is inadequate personnel, but I am saying that it is my conviction—and I believe the facts will bear out the statement—that in the last year or two OPA has not had sufficient personnel with which to keep the black market under reasonable curb. I believe that if we are going to give effect to the law, and take care of the number of cases which have to be processed, and if we are to have enforcement, any fair-minded man will say the agency cannot do an effective policing job in respect to their duties. That is what leads me to make the statement.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to say to the Senator from Florida that I voted with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for this cut because I believe Congress must and will pass some kind of uniform rent-control measure prior to April 30. I believe rent control should be continued. I did not believe the present rent control was operating effectively, as I viewed it, but, in my opinion, we must take some action, and therefore this appropriation, as it was worked out, was entirely proper.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able Senator from Massachusetts. It makes no difference to me what machinery is employed, just so we preserve the effective principle of rent control; but it seems to me, since today we have all this organization in the field, all over the United States, that it will be uneconomical to call them in and appoint others, no matter what character of control may be. My own opinion was that for the time being rent control should continue from now until June 30, and perhaps one more year. I do not say it should continue indefinitely. I think we had better take the ills we have than fly to others we know not of in the handling of this question.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire just one question. I understand the matter better now since the discussion, but I gather the position of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations in the matter to be that they want rent control continued, but that they are against OPA administering rent control, that therefore they want to liquidate OPA as soon as possible, in the hope that the Congress will pass another bill before April 30 which would again institute rent control, and that the majority is hopeful it will be under some other department. Let me ask if that is a correct statement?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; not exactly. Under the statute, which the Senator, I believe, supported, the OPA automatically expires on June 30. The only thing that this does is to make the expiration certain, to establish conditions which will make that mandatory expiration effective in toto at that time. But we believe sufficient funds are provided so that rent control can be administered up to June 30. Everybody admits that it can be continued in full until April 30. I am of the group who believe that while cutting the appropriation down materially, rent control can be continued on to June 30; but in the meantime, certainly, whether this bill be passed or not, it would be necessary to pick up the thread on June 30, either continuing rent control in this agency or some other agency. It is a matter of judgment.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I appreciate the position taken by the committee, but there is one thing I cannot understand. Everybody is agreed that rent control shall be continued. An agency is now functioning. The Senator from Florida is entirely correct in saying that never at any time during the life of the OPA has that agency had sufficient personnel for the enforcement of rent control. But there is an agency that is now doing it. We hope that Congress will step in. Why not make it sure, and let this agency continue until June 30? By whatever bill may be passed by the majority, continuing rent control, whether it is changed from OPA to another agency, or not, control can be made effective on June 30. If that were done, the people would be assured of rent control. As it is, the matter is being left in the air. If Congress does not act by April 30, what becomes of rent control?

Mr. BRIDGES. The people will be protected in the matter of rent control under the bill.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Will this measly appropriation, between April 30 and June 30?

Mr. BRIDGES. They certainly are going to be protected. This cry of withholding sufficient personnel falls on deaf ears, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I cannot see why sufficient funds were not given to continue rent control to June 30. Then, if Congress, as the Senator from Massachusetts pointed out, should consider a new rent-control bill, it may be that a decision would be made to place it under some other agency. If so, that could take effect on June 30.

It seems to me that, despite the intense feeling against OPA on the part of some of the Members on the opposite side of the aisle, they should not undertake now to completely cut off OPA. I think it is a very important matter. Everybody agrees rent control should be continued. Of course, there is nothing we can do about it, now that the conference report is in. I can only keep my fingers crossed and hope that something will happen by April 30. The man who is renting a home is not concerned with whether the Senator from New Hampshire wants rent control to be under OPA or under some other agency; all he is concerned about is keeping rent control. I hope we shall not lose it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I ask the Senator from Washington if he does not agree with me that we can, if the urgency becomes sufficiently great, pass another deficiency bill on this subject, before June 30?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Oh, I agree that we can; we can do anything within reason. I suppose that if the situation were to become bad, that is what we would do. In the meantime, what becomes of all the field agencies? If they begin to drop out, it will take time to reorganize them and to put them back to work. Even now, there will be an interim period in which rent control, to all intents and purposes, will be unenforced. The enforcement of rent control is going to be suspended.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is not that exactly what happened last summer? We allowed price controls to lapse; then, when we tried to reconstitute them, we found they had gotten out of hand, and it was absolutely impossible to control prices.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That is exactly what happened; and in this case there can be no enforcement in the field. I do not see how it is possible to liquidate this Office on April 30, and then reorganize the work and bring back all the necessary personnel, without creating a hiatus, during which the people will be without rent control, to all intents and purposes. Therefore, Mr. President, whether this be a record vote or not, I want to be recorded as being against the conference report, for the reasons stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S ADDRESS TO THE JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to take not more than 2 or 3 minutes to record some of my impressions of the President's speech. I was greatly impressed not only by the speech but by the President, and the attitude which he displayed in his speech before the joint session of Congress. I think that in this critical hour it is proper that some voices be raised in the Congress to make clear to the world that in time of crisis the President of the United States is our President and the President of 140,000,000 united American people.

Mr. President, I think the speech was so filled with significant implications that it is very important in this solemn hour that the people of the United States maintain very clear heads and endeavor to understand what it was in essence that the President was really talking about. As I understand the speech, I think he was talking about the objectives of the San Francisco Charter, and raising for us the question as to whether or not those objectives are to become realities in the history of the world. Unless they become realities the chance of permanent peace, in my judgment, is nil. I say that, Mr. President, as one who was deeply moved by the speech and by the clear demonstration of a sincerity on the part of our President which, it seems to me, entitles him to words of commendation at this time. I think we should make perfectly clear to the world that we shall approach the great problems that he raised in his speech with clear-headed objectivity, seeking to do that which is essential in the interest of the public welfare of our country and of the future peace of the world.

I say it, too, because in times past I have been critical of the President. I have disagreed with him on some issues. I probably will again in the future. On one occasion, Mr. President, I disagreed with the position which he took on an issue, and I think disagreement with him was deserved on the merits of the issue, but I want to say quite frankly that I think I was a bit unkind in the language which I used at the time in expressing my disagreement. Although I think I was quite right in taking exception to the position which he took on the merits of that issue, nevertheless I regret the unkindness of the language I used.

But I want to say on this occasion, Mr. President, that I believe my nonpartisanship is such that when the President of the United States has talked to us on a matter which I think is of great critical importance in the history of this Nation, and while I believe he is not deserving of blind acceptance of what he says, nevertheless I do think that in this hour we should make clear to the country that the President will receive our cooperation in solving the problem he has presented to us. The presumption is with him, because certainly no man, I care not who he may be, who sits at the head of this Government would come before the Congress of our people and make a speech of as great significance to our future as the one just delivered by President Truman without knowing his facts. As one citizen, as well as a Member of Congress, I want the President to know that as far as I am concerned I, too, think the time has come for us to stand as a united people in clear support of the objectives of the San Francisco Charter.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to yield and to answer if I can.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not true that the removal of the idea of spheres of influence, and of the idea of commercial exploitation, and of the idea of dominating weaker nations for the commercial advantage of others, is the outstanding factor about which the Senator is speaking?

Mr. MORSE. That is true, and I think that very principle is inherent throughout the address which the President just delivered. I think it runs through it in a very clear thread of meaning.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, proposed by the Senator from Washington, to insert in lieu of the italicized matter in lines 4 to 12, on page 2, the following: "No person shall be eligible to be elected to the office of President for more than two successive terms."

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. REVERCOMB obtained the floor.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me so that I may ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment, as modified?

Mr. REVERCOMB. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, there is now pending before the Senate as the unfinished business House Joint Resolution 27 which proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President. The purpose of the joint resolution is to submit to the several States a proposed amendment to the Constitution which would limit the tenure of the office of the President. We have debated this subject for several days. Amendments have been made to the measure reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and the next vote will be upon an amendment offered by the able Senator from Washington.

I think it well at this time to summarize the effect of the several amendments, beginning with the amendment which was reported to the Senate, and including the pending amendment of the Senator from Washington and the amendment which will be offered if the amendment of the Senator from Washington is not agreed to.

The amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee would have limited the President's tenure of office between a minimum of possibly 5 years and a maximum of 9 years less 1 day. The amendment of the able Senator from Washington would limit the tenure of office to a minimum of 8 years and a possible maximum of 12 years less 1 day. That amendment has been changed to read "successive terms of office." Therefore, if the amendment now before the Senate is adopted, it will mean that any person may possibly serve for 12 years in succession, less 1 day, then skip a term of office, and continue for another 12 years. We have been given notice that an amendment with respect to the limitation of time will be offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. Under that proposed amendment, if it reaches the floor, the minimum limitation upon tenure in the office of President would be 6 years and the maximum 10 years.

As a member of the Judiciary Committee and of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments, I frankly say to this body that I personally have favored the limitations placed in the amendment proposed by the committee. However, I know that a number of Members of the Senate believe that a possibility of 5 years as a minimum would be too short a time within which to limit any man in that office under the circumstances of succession from the Vice Presidency.

Certain Senators have indicated that they prefer the amendment which may be offered if the amendment of the Senator from Washington does not prevail, providing a minimum limitation of 6 years and a maximum of 10. I shall support that amendment. But I cannot support the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

The appeal has been made upon the ground that we would unduly limit individuals from holding office. That is not the real purpose of the amendment. The real heart of the amendment is to prevent any individual from holding too long the office of Chief Executive. As is well known, it became a custom firmly implanted in the tradition of this country for many years that one individual should not serve more than two terms as President of the United States. This custom began with the end of the second term of office of the first President, George Washington, when he declined to accept nomination after he had completed two terms. That custom lasted for more than 150 years, and was the subject of positive statement, sustained by a number of eminent men who had held the office of President.

Among them I cite the name of Thomas Jefferson, who time and again endorsed the rule that no man should serve for more than two terms. He gave his reasons. He feared that a despotism might grow in this country if any individual were permitted to occupy for too long the office of Chief Executive. Jefferson was a great believer in preserving the democracy of this country and setting up every possible barrier against autocratic rule.

Likewise, during his term of office, Andrew Jackson expressly subscribed to the limitation of the tenure of office in the Presidency, and he went so far in those early days as to say that there should be a constitutional amendment limiting the term of occupancy of the Presidency to 6 years.

Grover Cleveland, who held the office for two terms which were not consecutive, ably expressed his opposition to any one man continuing in office for too long. He took a more extreme position than any taken on the floor of the Senate. His position was that no man should hold the office of President beyond one term.

The reason for the rule is apparent and sound. Our fundamental concept is that government shall be in the will of the people. That at once makes us guarded against vesting power for too long a time in any man in any office. To grant extended power to any one man would be a definite step in the direction of autocracy, regardless of the name given the office, whether it be president, king, dictator, emperor, or whatever title the office may carry. It would be a definite step toward the destruction of real freedom of the people.

During the discussion of this subject, I have heard the argument made that we should not interfere with the will of the people in electing a President as many times as they may desire. We are not interfering with the will of the people. We are submitting, in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, which is the basic law of the land, the question as to whether or not the people wish to erect a safeguard against any man occupying the Presidency of the United States for an unlimited term.

There is no partisanship in this question. The proposed law is not aimed at any one man. It would apply to all in the future. It would be a safeguard and bulwark against a possible seizure of Executive direction in this great country of ours. So I submit that the joint resolution going to all the States of the Union and to the people for adoption is an effort to prevent possible autocracy arising in the future, and to preserve in truth representative government.

It may be argued that the Congress, the membership of which is elected from term to term, might well be sufficient assurance of safety against individual power in the Executive. I submit that the Congress cannot stop the growth of Executive powers which may be gained by an individual through long tenure in so powerful an office as that of President of the United States. There are immense innate powers in that office. They can be mushroomed fast or gradually grown until the strength of thorough despotism may be in the hands of one man, or a group of individuals, for that matter, to rule the people by his will and not by laws. If such a situation should be brought about it would be, in summary, the very destruction of government by free and independent people and a move toward the creation of dictatorship in fact.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to prevent with exactness the creation of such a possible situation. It is to guard the people against the destruction of the very basis of freedom under our Government. It is so fundamental to the very existence of the Government in the hands of the people that there should be no hesitancy in the adoption of the amendment by the people, and certainly no hesitancy on the part of the Senate in giving the people an opportunity to express their will.

The House of Representatives, by a large majority, has already sent to this body for our action a limitation upon the tenure of office. Are we to say to the people of the country, after the action of the House, that we will stop the people from voicing their views upon the question of the limitation of the term of President?

That is the question which we confront today.

It has been a tradition in the past, and even with that tradition without law on the subject, we have found since the early days and throughout the history of the country even men who have occupied the Presidency advocating, for the safety of the Union and for its life under freedom, a limitation upon the holding of the Presidential office. So when we discuss at this time the length of time that one may occupy the Presidency, whether it be a minimum of 5 years and a maximum of 10 years, a minimum of 8 years and a maximum of 12 years, or a minimum of 6 years and a maximum of 10 years, I cannot find any appeal in the argument that a wrong may be done a man who is nominated for the office of President or who may desire to hold that office. The appeal which is made to me is only that a limitation be placed on every man, whoever he may be, who may possibly take the office of the Presidency, to prevent him from ruling over the affairs of the people of this country through the power of that office for an undue length of time.

The custom has been broken, and in the future such an act may have the strength of precedent. That is all the more reason why we should join today with those who have advocated such a rule in the past, to see that a definite limitation is placed upon tenure of office.

As I have said, I feel that the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, which is the immediate question to be voted upon, which would permit not only tenure for 12 years minus 1 day, but would permit, after an interruption of 4 years, another 12 years minus a day, is very little limitation upon tenure of office. I believe there should be a definite and fixed time beyond which no man, whoever he may be, now or in the future, through the life of the Nation, may hold the office of President.

For that reason I must oppose the amendment of the Senator from Washington, and until it is agreeable to the Senate to consider some other amendment to the committee's proposal I must support the committee's proposal limiting the tenure of office of the President.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay action on the amendment, but I think that certain facts should be brought to the attention of Members of the Senate, which is engaged in a debate on a subject which goes back to the very foundation roots of the Nation.

In the first place, when the joint resolution was introduced and when the debate started, I felt, as has been so well expressed by my colleague from West Virginia, that the objection was that the President of the United States, due to the appointing power of the Executive, might grasp lifelong occupancy of the Presidency.

On Monday, when the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] spoke, I discovered that certain Senators thought that the amendment should be adopted for the protection of the health of the President of the United States. When that question first arose I thought of the protection of the health of a soldier in the United States Army during a critical emergency. We do not ask any questions about his health, unless he goes to a hospital. We do not discharge him when he is battle-weary, as a President might become while serving his country.

Thus I am caught between two theories in deciding how to vote on this very important question. On a question of this import, in which we go back and undertake to correct the ideas of the founding fathers of the Government, who wrote the Constitution, which we, no matter how egotistical we may become, must admit was a magnificent document, I think it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate of the United States to certain facts. I shall be frank when I say that had the proponents of the pending joint resolution agreed to the idea of submitting it to the people in convention, as was suggested by the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH], so that attention could be called to the effect of their action, I would have been very much inclined to go along, because, to my mind, the Government of the United States consists of the people of the United States. We of the Senate merely represent them in the seat of government.

For that reason I should like at this time to call attention to statements made by a number of very distinguished Members of this body and by various others on the question at issue.

I invite attention to a statement made by the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, grandfather of the present distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who thoroughly covered the whole field of argument in a speech which he made on this floor on February 1, 1913.

Senator Lodge opposed any change in the existing system. It had been suggested by other Members of this distinguished body that the Presidential tenure be limited to one term and that under such a limitation the President would not use the patronage of his great office to promote his own renomination and reelection. That goes to the first theory to which I refer.

Senator Lodge replied:

> I do not myself believe that patronage is very helpful in electing or reelecting anyone to office. On the contrary, I believe that as a rule it is positively harmful. Instances of the defeat either for nomination or for election are very frequent in our history of a President having all the patronage in his possession.

That was what the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge said about the President building up a huge patronage machine and perpetuating himself in office.

The point was raised on the floor then, as it has been during this debate, that the Presidential tenure should be limited to prevent what some refer to as a permanent President.

Apparently those proposing such a limitation are afraid of the people of the United States, who have the final deciding vote as to whether a President shall continue to hold the office to which he has previously been elected.

The late Woodrow Wilson, one of the truly great statesmen in the history of this country, said:

> Put the present limitation of two terms into the Constitution if you do not trust the people to take care of themselves.

The late Senator Lodge also maintained that the people had the right to determine how long a man should stay in office as President.

He told the gentlemen who were afraid of the Nation having a "permanent President" that—

> The protection of the country against caesarism or a dictatorship or a perpetual President rests in the character of the American people.

He also said:

> No paper provision can protect us against that. If we should reach the point where the people were ready to have a perpetual President or dictator, no constitutional provision would stand in the way.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the full text of Senator Lodge's speech on that occasion, for I think the Senate, as well as the people, should have an opportunity to study it.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am not in favor of this change in the Constitution. The chief argument which is offered for the passage of this joint resolution, limiting the President to one term, is that if he has no hope of reelection he will then devote himself exclusively to policies for the benefit of the country and to the work of the country, and that he will not use the patronage of his great office to promote his own renomination and reelection.

I do not myself believe that patronage is very helpful in electing or reelecting anyone to office. On the contrary, I believe that as a rule it is positively harmful. Instances of the defeat either for nomination or for election are very frequent in our history of a President having all the patronage in his possession. The use of patronage, of which complaint is made, is in reality chiefly with reference to its influence upon Congress. That the power of appointment has an influence upon Congress is, I think, undoubted, human nature being constructed as it is, but I cannot see that limiting the President to one term will alter the effect of the patronage on Congress. A President limited to one term, so far as he is personally concerned, is at least anxious that the policies to which he is committed and which he desires should be carried into execution. The patronage, if used at all, would be just as much used for that purpose as to promote his own reelection, and even more constantly.

If a President is debarred from using the power of his great office to secure his own renomination or his own reelection, surely he will be desirous to have a successor who shall be in sympathy with his views, who will be willing to carry out the policies which he has been unable to complete; he will desire that his own party shall remain in power, for a President without a party and without party principles would not be a desirable President. Therefore, it does not seem to me that we really gain anything in that direction, and, although superficially the argument resting on the case of the Presidential power appears to have much weight, it seems to me in its essence to have very little.

There is another reason which we hear spoken of, but which I need not dwell upon, namely, that a provision of this kind in the Constitution of the United States will be a defense against caesarism, against a permanent President or dictator. The protection of the country against caesarism or a dictatorship or a perpetual President rests in the character of the American people. No paper provision can protect us against that. If we should reach the point where the people were ready to have a perpetual President or dictator, no constitutional provision would stand in the way of a revolution of that character in our system of government, if the people had sunk to that point.

Now, we are asked to take from the people by this proposed constitutional amendment the decision of a question which they are preeminently capable of settling. There is no question whatever that the voters of this country are able to say whether they think a certain man who has served as President ought again to be President, and it seems to me we are simply taking from the people by this proposed constitutional amendment a right which ought not to be denied them. I have sufficient confidence in the American people to believe that they can be trusted absolutely to say who shall be President of the United States and to determine whether a man who has once been President is fit to be President again.

It would have been a melancholy day for this country if we had been unable to elect to a second term George Washington or Abraham Lincoln. No man can tell when a situation will arise when it might be a vital necessity to retain for a second term a President then in office. We might be engaged in a war where it would be the veriest misfortune conceivable to say that the man at the head of the Government should be changed.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I have just submitted, without reading in toto, the speech made by Senator Lodge. He also pointed out that President Washington had planned to retire at the end of his first term, but because of developments in Europe at the end of his first term and because of complications in respect to foreign affairs, he decided that once more he would accept the nomination and the election.

History also records that George Washington wrote to the Marquis de La Fayette, on April 28, 1788, as follows:

I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the service of any man who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable as serving the public.

The Presidential tenure debate came up during President Grant's occupancy of the White House, just as it has come up every few years since our Constitution was written.

President Grant wrote a letter to Gen. Harry White, president of the Pennsylvania Republican State Convention, on May 29, 1875, in which he set forth his views on the tenure debate. He said:

It may happen in the future history of the country that to change an Executive because he has been 8 years in office will prove unfortunate if not disastrous. The idea that any man could elect himself President, or even renominate himself, is preposterous. It is a reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of the people to suppose such a thing possible. Any man can destroy his chances for the office, but no one can force an election or even a nomination.

Mr. President, how long should a President serve? Should he serve 4 years, 6 years, 8 years, 11 years, or 16 years?

The answer, of course, as the late Woodrow Wilson so eloquently stated, is that—

Four years is too long a term for a President who is not the true spokesman of the people. It is too short a term for a President who is doing or attempting a great work or reform and who has not had time to finish it.

The people themselves have the right to determine how many terms a President may serve.

Mr. President, only recently in this Chamber, the able junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] suggested that the issue be called to the special attention of the people by having the amendment acted upon in constitutional conventions in the several States. This proposal of calling it to the attention of the people was rejected by the Senate. Now, the whole subject is proposed to be submitted to the legislatures of the various States, who are elected on general platforms, who are subject to all the lobbying which occurs in the various State legislatures, and who have no particular mission from the people to decide what shall be done.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in this long debate none of the proponents of this proposed constitutional amendment have suggested a limitation on the number of terms a Member of Congress may serve. Presidents are elected in the same way that Members of Congress are elected. The people have the right to reject a man seeking reelection to the Presidency, just as they have the right to reject a man seeking reelection to the Congress. The difference seems to be that two different departments of government are involved, one the executive and the other the legislative. If we are to place a limitation on one, why not place a limitation on the other?

The answer is that under our Constitution the people have the sovereign right to keep in office or to reject at an election any public official.

The Washington Evening Star of Monday, February 24, stated that—

The drive for a constitutional amendment limiting future Presidents to two terms has about it an atmosphere of political immaturity—a suggestion that the inheritors of the best political system in the world lack confidence in the essential foundation of their political structure.

In the same editorial it was also stated:

The question which should be posed to the sponsors of the amendment is this: Why should we of this generation undertake to tie the hands of our children in any and all circumstances, none of which can be foreseen now? Surely, on the record of our own performance, we have no valid claim to the requisite wisdom. Why not permit them to make their own free decision in the light of conditions which they will have to face and which we cannot possibly anticipate? That is the essence of the democratic process, and we would pay ourselves a highly dubious compliment in undertaking to short-circuit it. This amendment is one which should not pass, and the Star hopes that it will never be written into the Constitution.

Mr. President, this question and all the issues involved have been discussed innumerable times since the days of George Washington, and each and every time the proposal has come up it has been rejected. It has always been left to the people to decide in elections in which they participate. No temporary hysteria has been permitted to govern the right of the people to continue a man in an office if they felt he was needed or was doing a good job.

Why has this question been raised again, Mr. President? The people are not crying out for a two-term limitation. Then why has the issue been raised again? Of course, the reason is that some Members of the Congress are anxious to do everything possible to discredit one of the most progressive Presidents this Nation has ever known. Those gentlemen may have the votes to pass this resolution; but, Mr. President, they do not have the votes and they do not have the record to discredit Franklin D. Roosevelt. President Roosevelt will be remembered as a true champion of the people long after his political snipers have been forgotten.

In closing, I should like to list a few of the many arguments against changing the Constitution. Let me say that these arguments have been culled from the statements of many Presidents and many distinguished Members of this body:

First, 170 years have passed without the adoption of a constitutional amendment limiting the term of the President, and without the rise of any dictators in this country. Let me add that on each occasion, unless there was a special requirement, the man who held the office has voluntarily asked to be permitted to step out of the way.

Second, if the American people really feared a dictatorship they would have insisted long before now on such a constitutional amendment.

Third, there is no danger of dictatorship through unlimited tenure, inasmuch as the people have the opportunity to turn out any incumbent every 4 years. Let me add that on a Nation-wide scale the amount of patronage involved is so infinitesimal that no man could hope to hold the office through patronage alone.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator agree with me that the limitation on the sovereign rights of the people under the proposed amendment really looks down the road toward dictatorship?

Mr. KILGORE. Let me say to the Senator from Illinois that I think the method pursued looks down the road toward oligarchy, rather than dictatorship. In other words, the Congress is trying to take a step that looks down the road toward dictatorship, but I would rather use the word "oligarchy," because it is being used by a group of people rather than one person.

Mr. LUCAS. Suppose a President of the United States has served two terms——

Mr. KILGORE. Or one and a fraction terms.

Mr. LUCAS. Or one and a fraction terms—and suppose he has served his country faithfully and well, that he is a tried and popular executive, let us assume that the Nation faces an atomic emergency, if you please, when the issue may be whether we will live or die; what does the Senator think the people may do at that particular time, if they are strong enough in their demand that that man continue to represent them in the office of President, the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. KILGORE. If they proceeded legally, of course, they would have to wait 7 or 8 years in order to change their Constitution, but if they were in dire distress, they might set up a dictator to avert disaster. In other words, in dire distress, we would be inviting a dictatorship by refusing to the people of the country the right to elect the man they wanted to act under the circumstances as they arose.

Mr. LUCAS. That is the very point I made a moment ago. In other words, the proposed constitutional amendment could well invite the people at some future time, in a great emergency, to look toward dictatorship, if it would mean continuing in power the man who was in the Presidency, even though under the Constitution he could not be reelected. That is the point I make.

Mr. KILGORE. In my opinion, the Senator from Illinois is absolutely correct, and I thank him for his remarks.

Who constitutes our Government, but the people? We hear about government, but the people themselves are the Government. We are their elected Representatives. The President is their Executive, the Supreme Court is an employee of the people. If the people cannot be trusted to vote intelligently, even a constitutional amendment limiting the Presidential term will not prevent the rise of a dictatorship, as has so well been stated by the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

The fifth point is that the number of Presidential terms should not be limited, because we might deprive the American people of the services of the best man in any emergency, the man who knew the most about it, who had the inside facts, who was conversant with the situation. He might be prevented from being chosen, unless we had a dictatorship brought about by revolution, or unless we waited 7 years, and perhaps lost out.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. We have just listened to the speech made by the President of the United States before the joint session of the Congress. The world is looking to the United States for leadership. We are the only free power that is left in the world which has any inherent leadership right, a Nation which has existed for 150 years under the limitations placed in the Constitution by common consent. Ours is the most powerful nation on the globe, the finest nation, with the finest people, with the highest standards of living, and the highest type of civilization and now, at a time when the world is looking to us for leadership, it is proposed that we go in the opposite direction, by placing limitations on the rights of our own people to choose their own Executive.

The people of this country like a change, and they usually get it when they want it. It seems to me to the irony of fate that as we stand at the crossroads, so to speak, we are asked to place this kind of a limitation upon the rights of the people of the United States at a time when we are looked upon with awe and admiration by all the powers of the earth. Yet at this moment we asked to change the Constitution drawn by the fathers, who knew plenty about free government. It is said that we are now better prepared, here on the floor of the United States Senate today, than the people of tomorrow will be. It is said we know more about what is good for the citizen and the youth of tomorrow than what they will know themselves.

I shall not undertake that responsibility, Mr. President, because I do not think there is any omnipotent power in the membership of the United States Senate that can tell the citizen of tomorrow that we know more than he does as to what will be good for him and his country. That is exactly what we are asked to do when we are asked to vote for the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

The Senator from West Virginia well said a moment ago that such a change in the Constitution has never been made. It has been attempted all through the years, but it has never "jelled" at any time. I do not say that some do not have earnest convictions upon this subject, as men have in the past, but, as the Senator well said, we know whence the idea comes. It cannot be camouflaged. I say we would be taking a serious step, an erroneous step, we would be moving in the wrong direction rather than in a progressive direction, if we approved this proposed amendment.

Mr. KILGORE. I thank the Senator from Illinois for his able discussion of that point. I go a little further and say that in the history of the United States up until a crisis arose there has never been a President, no matter how powerful, who desired to be a dictator. Andrew Jackson unquestionably could have been elected for a third term had he desired it. Presidents have never sought to be dictators. They have been Americans. The present President of the United States, President Truman, has faced, and will continue to face, gigantic problems and upon their proper solution will depend our safety, the safety of our children, the safety of our grandchildren.

Mr. President, it is not safe to trifle with futures, it is not safe to bind my children, my grandchildren, your children, your grandchildren, by the decision of a group of Senators here whom we offered the compromise of putting to the people of the States in conventions, the consideration of but one question, not the question of taxes, not the question of appropriations, not the question of power interests, or railroad interests, or coal interests, or manufacturing interests, as the primary subject, but the question only of how many terms a President should have. That was denied by a vote day before yesterday.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to ask my distinguished colleague from West Virginia if it is not a fact that of the first 21 amendments to the Constitution of the United States, 20 were ratified by State legislatures, and only one by State conventions.

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator from California is absolutely correct. To be perfectly frank, 10 of them, at least, were left out of the Constitution by inadvertence, and there was no question of the destiny of the United States involved in any of the 21, save one. Two others of those amendments, Mr. President, have been grossly abused.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, in view of the question by the Senator from California, pointing out that heretofore all amendments to the Constitution had been ratified by the State legislatures rather than by conventions, I should like to point out further that never but once in the history of our country has there been proposed to the Constitution of the United States an amendment which would restrict the power of the people. In every single instance, from the time of the adoption of the bill of rights down through the twenty-first amendment, every one of them was an extension of the power of the people and not a retraction thereof.

As the Senator who, in the Judiciary Committee, sponsored the proposal that this amendment be offered to conventions rather than to legislatures, I did it, not out of any belief in the principle that we should limit the term of the presidency, but that if we were to submit such a proposal, then there should be obtained the greatest democratic expression on that issue it was possible to get, because, practically for the first time in the history of our country, we were taking something away from the people. So if it is to be true that all amendments to the Constitution heretofore adopted have been approved by the political legislatures of our several States, it is likewise true that never before in our history had an amendment been proposed, excepting the prohibition amendment, that attempted to take anything away from the rights of the people. If a review is made from the beginning of the 10 amendments that make up the bill of rights, and if a further review is made of every one of the other amendments to the Constitution, it will be found that inevitably they represented a seeking on the part of the people of further rights in their own hands.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IVES in the chair.) Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KILGORE. Before I yield, I should like to say a few words, having yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. KILGORE. May I also say, Mr. President, that the Senator from Rhode Island discussed with me the very question raised, and on that occasion I agreed that if this proposal could be submitted to the people, I was perfectly willing to let the people decide it. But, when that privilege was denied, I then decided that I would not support a proposal to remove from the people of the United States the right to elect to the office of President whomever they wanted to elect.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I merely want to point out that every one of the first 10 amendments was a limitation on the right of the people. They protect the rights of individuals, but they deprived the people of rights. They deprived the people of the right to an establishment of religion in the United States. They deprived the people of the right to abridge freedom of speech or of the press——

Mr. KILGORE. Since the distinguished Senator from Ohio seems to be making a speech rather than making an inquiry, may I interrupt to say that while the amendment to which he refers interferes with the right of the people to establish a religion, it establishes the basic right of the United States of America, which is that everybody in the United States has a right, so long as it does not conflict wth the rights of others.

Sixth. The free choice of the people would be limited by a constitutional amendment prohibiting a third term.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will yield, I want to call attention to the fact that this inhibition of the Constitution is not on the people, not on their right to establish a religion; it is on Congress. It says:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

These limitations are on the Congress.

Mr. KILGORE. I thank the Senator from Alabama. He has ably stated the case.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to answer?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KILGORE. No; I am not going to yield until I finish. Then I shall yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio for the remainder of the afternoon. I may say that on numerous occasions I have asked the Senator from Ohio to yield, and he has refused. I want to complete my statement, because I think in an humble way it may have some historical value. Then I shall answer any question the Senator from Ohio may have.

Seventh. To limit the terms for President is to imply that the people cannot be trusted to exercise good judgment and to cast doubt on the theory of popular government—the theory upon which this Nation was founded.

Eighth. Limiting the term will mean limiting the sovereignty of the people, for the views of the majority should always be supreme.

Ninth. The Executive's effectiveness will be seriously impaired, as no one will obey and respect him if he knows that the Executive cannot run again because of a constitutional limitation. I may say, Mr. President, that I have had the opportunity in the past 8 years to study the record of governors in States in which there are limitations as to terms, and I have discovered that invariably the last half of the term was a record of failure. Almost invariably, incumbents have had trouble, because everybody realized they could not run again. There was no method by which they could complete their programs; but, so long as there is a possibility that they may run again, they can go ahead successfully.

Tenth. The President is expected to be a leader and to carry the responsibility for all actions done under his administration. In this connection I ask the Senators who proposed this amendment, When, in public forums, on the air, in newspaper interviews, in speeches, have they failed to cast upon the President the blame for anything that falls short of accomplishment during his administration, or that does not work out successfully? He is expected to be the leader, and he is charged with the responsibility of carrying out his program. If he cannot run again, he loses all opportunity of getting his program through, of making it successful.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent to have included in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a speech by the late Senator Simeon D. Fess, of Ohio, delivered on February 9, 1928, against the La Follette anti-third-term resolution. I would like to have it added at the end of my speech, in full, as it goes into the question of the third term.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. KILGORE. I would also like to have printed in the RECORD following the speech of the late Senator Fess, an address delivered by the late United States Senator Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, in March 1880, which speech was printed in the North American Review, at that time. I should like to have it made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. (See exhibit 2.)

Mr. KILGORE. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the full text of the editorial from the Washington Evening Star on the question of this amendment.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. (See exhibit 3.)

Mr. KILGORE. In order to make this question clear from a historical viewpoint, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two excerpts from the Congressional Digest of 1938, entitled "The United States Constitution and the Presidency."

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD. (See exhibit 4.)

EXHIBIT 1

SENATOR SIMEON D. FESS

When the question arose in reference to the Chief Executive, the convention originally proposed a term of 7 years, with ineligibility for reelection. When a vote was called upon that proposal Washington was included in the list of those who voted against it. Although he did not make any comment at the time, later on, as is well understood, Washington had a conversation with Jefferson on the matter, and they did not agree. Also, Washington wrote a reply to General Lafayette, who specifically addressed a letter to Washington on the support of ineligibility to reelection. In the reply of General Washington he took a decided position against the Jeffersonian view. So it was decided not to limit tenure. The Constitutional Convention did fix a short term, but kept open the question of tenure, so that if experience might count for anything it would be utilized in the administration of the Government.

I think that the most concrete illustration of the difference between a limited term and a limited tenure will be found in the case of members of both legislative bodies. The term of Members of the House and Members of the Senate is fixed, but their tenure is not limited. Neither is there a prohibition of eligibility to reelection in either case, nor is there in the case of the Chief Executive. In other words, the Constitutional Convention decided in both cases that a limitation on tenure was not wise, and that the question of eligibility to reelection should be kept open as a privilege on the part of the people.

In the case of the executive branch of the Government we have in practice both the limit of term and the limit of tenure. Custom thus far has limited the tenure of the Executive to two terms. That may have the force of law, but there is no constitutional inhibition against extending the term of the Executive beyond the second term.

Neither is there any inhibition in regard to the Members of this body—the Senate—or the Members of the House of Representatives. The rule in the House is limited term, but unlimited tenure, upon the basis that experience is of value in legislation.

The same thing is true in this body—the Senate. It may be of interest to know that in the Constitutional Convention, George Mason, of Virginia, the father of the famous Bill of Rights of Virginia, raised the question of limiting the tenure of Members of the Senate and argued that Senators should not be elected for more than one term and employed in his argument a force that is second only in effect to that which he applied to the Executive. When the vote was taken, and the tenure of Members of the Senate was not limited to one term, George Mason gave it as his mature judgment that a great mistake had been made by the Constitutional Convention.

As we believe that unlimited tenure in this body employs experience and capitalizes ability, so it seems to me it is equally true in the case of the President.

I am aware that the President of the United States is under a burden that it is quite difficult for him to sustain from the pressure that comes to him from outside sources that is made possible by his reelection. In other words, Presidents break under the burdens of the office very largely through attempting to respond to requests that cannot be met.

I do not believe I speak amiss when I say I cannot avoid the thought that the life of the late President Harding—who seemed to permit his personality to go out to everyone who appeared in his presence—was very much shortened by the burdens of the office.

Not every President would be so affected. I have thought that it might be wise for us to pass a constitutional amendment to extend the term of the President and limit to one term; but it has never been looked upon with favor. After all, I suppose it would be still better for us to continue the practice of limiting term but not limiting tenure except by the vote of the people, as is done in the House, and as is done in the Senate. It is not a mooted question that the third term that was denied originally to the Presidents who might have been elected to a third term was not denied them by the people. It was simply never requested by those who might have achieved a third term.

There has been much confusion about Washington's attitude. Over and over again we hear it stated in this and other bodies that Washington set the example by turning away the honor of a third election as if it were a matter of principle with him, instead of a matter of purely personal convenience. I admit that the precedent was set by Washington. I admit that he was not elected to a third term; but I will not admit that he believed that a third term was vicious, or that he ever thought it was unpatriotic, or that he thought it would not be a wise course. The truth about the matter is that when he asked Madison to draw up in convenient shape what would suit him for a farewell address it was at the end of his first term. There was not any doubt of his intention to retire at the end of the first term. In that address I find these words, which are constantly quoted by the proponents of this resolution as being the words of Washington:

"May I be allowed further to add as a consideration far more important that an early example for rotation in an office of so high and delicate a nature may equally accord with the republican spirit of our Constitution and the ideas of liberty and safety entertained by the people."

"Rotation in office!" That is stated as being in accord with our views of democratic government.

That statement was written by Madison. That statement was not in the President's Farewell Address when he finally delivered it to the American people. This particular item of Madison's draft was never accepted by President Washington.

On the other hand Washington, because of developments in Europe and our complications on foreign affairs, decided that he would again accept the nomination and election. Then at the approach of the end of the second term, if he had any idea whatever of objecting to a third term on the ground that it would be unpatriotic or that it would not be a wise course, rather than upon the ground of his personal tastes and personal conveniences, it would have been in that address that the statement would have been made, but the farewell address of the President of 1796 can be scanned from the first word to the last and there will be found no hint of his objection to a third term in principle.

As to Jefferson and Madison and Monroe, they represented an entirely different school of politics. There were two well-defined schools of politics in the Constitutional Convention, and while Jefferson was not in that convention he did have his representatives there, especially in Madison and in George Mason, of Virginia.

Jefferson emphasized the idea of liberty. Jefferson feared autocracy. Jefferson was afraid of too much power, too much government. However, we may explain the source of his fear, that was fundamental with him, and I regard it as tremendously important not only in any study of our political theory but in the development of our American political theory

While Jefferson, therefore, was not in the Constitutional Convention to work out his ideas, he was in contact and communication with the men who were there who represented his views. He was quite normally committed to the idea of one term and no reelection, but I have found no indication anywhere that he was in favor of making the term 4 years, and the Executive ineligible for reelection with that short a term.

Jefferson's opposition to a third term was better fortified and more warranted than any opposition to a third term in this day would be. Jefferson lived at a time when the Republic was young, when we had no friends. Jefferson sat in the Legislature of Virginia, which was not then a sovereign State, but a colony which ought to have had the right of local government, and he saw the legislature of his own State, of which he was a part, dissolved by a royal governor appointed by the King of England.

Jefferson had reason for fearing the dangers of Executive usurpation. He also had reason for fearing the man on horseback, because Napoleon was in the saddle at that time. There is not the slightest fear of that today, is there?

Whatever legitimate grounds there may have been against a third term in the early history of our country, those grounds do not now obtain.

With the growth of industry in America, with great masses of our people employed in factories located in great centers of population and wholly dependent upon the continuance of their occupations for a livelihood, I confess I sometimes tremble when I think of the possibility of any derangement in industrial conditions such as might be caused by a great depression which would cause populations to suffer for want of work.

In case that industry should fail to give employment, operatives be thrown out of employment, and a great strike ensue, I can imagine that, under certain leadership, a despotism might ensue.

However, I do not think that a vote in the Senate on the question of a third Presidential term would have as much effect as a fly on a dog's ear in a case such as that.

For a hundred years before the Federal Constitution the Thirteen Colonies were training themselves for government in which all the people should participate, and then, after 100 years of such training, there was convened the Constitutional Convention, which framed an instrument, containing only seven articles, that has been the bulwark of our liberty and our organic law for 139 years, during which time the country has never experienced a revolution. I do not think there is in America any danger at all of what has taken place in Italy. I do not for a moment think it possible.

There are eight nations in Europe now that might be regarded as being under dictators, all the result of the World War. There is not any possibility of that sort of thing taking place here in America. We view the problems of government on an entirely different plane, and I think it is the result of 250 years of training.

If Washington would have permitted himself to run in 1796 he would have been elected without doubt. I think there is no doubt that if Andrew Jackson would have given any intimation that he wanted to succeed himself in 1837, instead of really appointing his own successor in Martin Van Buren, he could have elected himself more easily or as easily as to have selected his successor.

I have not the slightest doubt that if President Lincoln had been spared to complete his second term, because of the popularity he had enjoyed and the confidence and love he had inspired, he could have been reelected. I also have not any doubt if Colonel Roosevelt had been nominated in 1912 without opposition, although having served, as he claimed, two terms, that he would have been easily elected, and if death had not taken him when it did there would not have been a single opposing candidate against him in 1920, and he would have been overwhelmingly elected in that year, notwithstanding the fact that he had been twice President. I think there is no doubt about what would have taken place in elections in spite of the third-term tradition if these persons had announced themselves candidates.

I have looked upon the term of 1 year and 7 months of the present President as a fraction of a term, I did not count that as a full term. I looked upon the close of the present term as not the completion of two terms. That is the reason why I constantly attempted to refute the idea that if President Coolidge were renominated there would be any violation of the third-term tradition. It would be a tenure longer than 8 years; it would be an innovation to that extent—that is, no President in our history has ever served more than 8 years—but, while it would be a year and 7 months more than 8 years, it would not be a violation of the third-term tradition. If that would be a violation of it, then 1 year more would be, or 1 day more would be; and I have thought that an untenable position.

I would say frankly today that if the way opens for the nomination of President Coolidge I do not hesitate to say that he will be elected by one of the largest majorities ever given in an election, in spite of the tradition that friends of mine say would be broken on the third-term matter.

I have noted with the greatest interest the Democratic planning and strategy that has surrounded the name of President Coolidge ever since the suggestion was made that he might be renominated. I admire the brilliant strategy. It is not only seen among Democratic Senators but it is read in every great Democratic newspaper. They are taking this view: The men who say that President Coolidge could not accept a nomination tendered to him when it is not sought because it would be bad faith, because it would be insincerity, because it would show a lack of character, are expressing a wish rather than a judgment. There is not any doubt about that.

SENATOR TIMOTHY O. HOWE

The Springer resolution is the first echo of George Mason's speech. Among all the men who debated the Constitution, either in the Federal or the several State conventions, there are but two who are open to the suspicion of having favored a legal restriction upon the right to reelect Presidents. Those two are Melancthon Smith, of New York, and George Mason, of Virginia. But it should be remembered in exculpation of Smith and Mason that they were openly trying to defeat the Constitution. They were opposed to it. They had not sworn to support it. It was not unnatural that they should raise unreal objections to it.

The men who made the Constitution struggled to secure the reeligibility of Presidents. They surrendered preferences, abandoned cherished ideas, and devised new plans, in order to preserve the right to repeat the elections and prolong the services of able and upright Presidents. They could hardly have expected that within a century a generation would appear whose representatives would dare to proclaim that the exercise of that simple right for which they sacrified so much was "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

The resolution refers to the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents, in retiring after the second term, and declares that precedent to have become part of our republican system. But a majority of our Presidents have retired after a first term. Why should the two-term precedent become a part of our governmental system more than the one-term precedent? It may be said that General Washington chose to retire at the end of his second term. The fact was so; but it is difficult to see how General Washington's refusal, in the latter part of the last century, to serve a third term should debar the people, in the latter part of this century or the next, from choosing a man a third time who will serve. But if General Washington's personal tastes are equivalent to a constitutional limitation, then the one-term rule should prevail and not the two-term. He ardently desired to retire at the end of his first term. He avowed that desire often and earnestly. He assigned his reasons frankly and repeatedly. His reasons were personal, not patriotic. He never pretended that he sought retirement to promote the public welfare, but only to gratify his own feelings. He said to Mr. Jefferson that "he had through the whole course of the war, and most particularly at the close of it, uniformly declared his resolution to retire from public affairs, and never to act in any public office; that he had retired under that firm resolution; that the government, however, which had been formed, being found evidently too inefficacious, and it being supposed that his aid was of some consequence toward bringing the people to consent to one of sufficient efficacy for their own good, he consented to come into the convention, and on the same motive, after much pressing, to take a part in the new Government, and get it under way. That were he to continue longer, it might give room to say that, having tasted the sweets of office, he could not do without them; that he really felt himself growing old, his bodily health less firm; his memory, always bad, becoming worse, and perhaps the other faculties of his mind showing a decay to others of which he was insensible himself; that this apprehension particularly oppressed him. That he found, moreover, his activity lessened, business therefore more irksome, and tranquillity and retirement become an irresistible passion."

His personal wishes were overruled. He consented to a reelection and was unanimously reelected. Envious of his overshadowing fame, jealous of his commanding influence with the people, fearful that they might again refuse to permit his retirement at the end of his second term, the hungry pack, who longed to succeed him, commenced systematically to tear him down. The air was filled with calumny, with caricature, with lampoons, and lies. Partisan malice pursued him with that same houndlike ferocity with which it pursued President Grant during his second term. He did not bear it as Grant bore it. No man saw President Grant quail before the gibes of his enemies or before the guns of his country's enemies. Washington was stung to the quick by the injustice of his countrymen.

Before the first year of his second term was ended, Jefferson reports that at a Cabinet meeting "the President was much inflamed; got into one of those passions when he cannot command himself; ran on much on the personal abuse which had been bestowed on him; defied any man on earth to produce one single act of his, since he had been in the Government, which was not done on the purest motives; that he had never repented but once having slipped the moment of resigning his office, and that was every moment since; that by God he had rather be on his farm than to be made emperor of the world; and yet that they were charging him with wanting to be a king."

Washington, like Grant—the father of his country like the savior of it—was accused of Caesarism. It is not so very strange that 3,000,000 people just emerged from monarchy should be jealous of imperial designs. But it is passing strange that 40,000,000 just swaggering into the second century of freedom should be scared by so soft a spook.

No one expected to dissuade President Washington from the retirement he so passionately coveted beyond the expiration of his second term. He was 61 years old when that term commenced. He was 65 when it ended. He died before the next term ended. The number of his enemies had multiplied. Their hate was intensified. Jefferson had left his Cabinet. Madison was alienated from him. He had been compelled to recall Monroe from France. He yearned for rest, and he inflexibly sought it. Such was the example of our first President.

No one asked Mr. Adams to accept a third term. But few asked him to accept a second. His example, therefore, furnishes no more sanction to the Springer resolution than does the example of Mr. Washington.

Mr. Jefferson furnishes a precedent more to the purpose. The legislatures of several States formally invited him to become a candidate for a third term. He as formally declined the invitation. He stated his reasons for declining as follows: "That I should lay down my charge at a proper period is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will, in fact, become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing that a representative government, responsible at short periods of election, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle, and I should unwillingly be the person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office. * * * Truth, also, requires me to add that I am sensible to that decline which advancing years brings on; and, feeling their physical, I ought not to doubt their mental, effect. Happy if I am the first to perceive and obey this admonition of nature, and to solicit a retreat from cares too great for the wearied faculties of age."

Those reasons are satisfactory. Undoubtedly, every public functionary should lay down his "charge at a proper period." But the proper period is just as clearly that which suits the public convenience, and not that which suits the convenience of the individual. History has already exploded the assumption of Mr. Jefferson that, if the term of service for the Chief Magistrate be not fixed, he will continue to hold it for life. The term of service is not fixed by any law or any practice, and yet not one-half our Chief Magistrates have, in fact, been elected even the second time. "A representative government responsible at short periods of election" is undoubtedly wise, and "That which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind." But the right to elect Government agents at short periods does not involve the necessity of electing a new agent at each recurring period. Elections should be not only periodical but free. If the people really wished Mr. Jefferson to serve a third term and he refused to do so, then the election of 1808 was not free but restricted. The people had not free choice but restricted choice, and their freedom was impaired by the act of Mr. Jefferson. But Mr. Jefferson is not exposed to that imputation. He could have assigned a better reason for declining to serve a third term than any of those he did assign. That better reason was, that he could not be elected to a third term. That fact had been made quite manifest at the time he declined to be a candidate. Nothing is clearer in history than that he waited for just that manifestation of public opinion before he did decline. The legislature of Vermont first threw his flag to the breeze on the 5th of November, 1806. More than 2 years before his second term expired, the legislature of Vermont addressed to Mr. Jefferson a formal invitation to become a candidate for a third term. In December following the legislature of Georgia joined in that invitation. Maryland did the same in January 1807. Rhode Island in February, and New York and Pennsylvania in March, followed their example.

Mr. Jefferson is known to have been a most diligent correspondent. During all those months he was constantly receiving letters from individuals, from municipalities, from religious societies, and political organizations. He replied to such promptly, becomingly. But to the legislatures of these great States he deigned no reply for more than a year after the first one addressed him. On December 4, 1807, the Legislature of New Jersey having joined in the invitation of Vermont, Mr. Jefferson determined to wait no longer. He addressed letters to Vermont, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, declining to be a candidate for reelection. In stating his reasons for declining, he employed the same terms in each letter. Those letters bear date of the 10th of December, 1807. They were given to the public in the columns of the Aurora, at Philadelphia, on the 19th of the same month. Up to that time no one had heard an objection to a third term. Seven States had asked Mr. Jefferson to accept a third term. Nobody had objected to his having another term because he had enjoyed two. What he himself thought of a third term he had diligently concealed from the public during the whole agitation. Two days before his letter appeared in the Aurora, that journal copied from the Trenton True American an article commencing in these words: "Will Mr. Jefferson consent to serve another term as President? is a question which almost every Republican anxiously asks, but which no one can certainly answer." (The political party organized by Jefferson was first known as the Republican Party, but later became the Democratic Party, as it is known today.) The States which at that time had declared for a third term cast 62 electoral votes. North Carolina subsequently joined the number. North Carolina then gave 11 votes. That would make the number of electoral votes which had declared for Mr. Jefferson 73.

But the States of Ohio, Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, South Carolina, and, worst of all, Virginia, where both Jefferson and Madison had their homes, obstinately refused to join in the Jefferson boom. They were Republican States, they voted for Madison, and they were accorded 55 electoral votes.

Then the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Delaware cast 39 electoral votes. They were Federal States, not Republican. They voted for Pinckney, and would not vote for Jefferson or Madison either.

Of course, when it was ascertained that there were 39 votes which no Republican could secure, and 55 Republican votes which Jefferson could not receive, but Madison could, the former had excellent reasons for declining a third term for all his successors. When satisfied, after an active canvass of more than 13 months, that the people did not wish to prolong his services beyond a second term, he did well to recognize the fact. He would have done better if he had not attempted to frame his disappointment into a law which should prevent any of his successors from serving longer than he did.

There is ground for believing that if Mr. Van Buren had not secured the succession to General Jackson, the latter would have been retained another term. That expedient was discussed at the time. The Herald, a Democratic newspaper of Philadelphia, then said:

"The present attitude of Judge White, of Tennessee, appears rather calculated to produce an impression of division in the Democratic ranks of a serious character. But this danger will vanish when we reflect that if it should appear formidable, when the national convention meets, that body will dissipate it in a few minutes by the nomination of Andrew Jackson for a third term, a measure every way calculated to avert the defeat of the Democratic Party by the Whigs, and more than justifiable by every principle involved in the contest of the party who are fighting for popular rights and democratic government."

But constitutions, history, precedents, and statesmen have been misconstrued before the era of the Springer resolution. Rarely, however, has the human understanding been so rudely insulted as by that strange fulmination.

To tell rational creatures that "free institutions" are imperiled by the reelection of one who for 8 years has proved a faithful magistrate, but are insured by the election of one who has never been proved at all, seems to be the extreme of audacity. That is to say, that our institutions would have been endangered by the election of George Washington to a third term, but were preserved by the election of John Adams; that is to say, that our republican system would have been threatened by a third election of James Madison or Andrew Jackson, but was preserved by the fortunate election of James Monroe and Martin Van Buren.

"I have no other lamp by which to guide my feet," said Patrick Henry, "than the light of experience."

When science fails and revelation is silent, one has no better light than that. And, if experience teaches anything, it teaches that, the longer a public servant has been faithful, the surer he is to be faithful. That is as true of the head of the Nation as of the head of a bureau. The railway manager who should dismiss a conductor, or the banking company which should dismiss a cashier who had been faithful for 8 or for 18 years, upon the presumption that because he had been faithful so long it was unsafe to trust him longer, would be deemed insane.

It is even more irrational to conclude that one who has for 8 years scrupulously guarded the solemn trusts reposed in an American President is for that reason to be more distrusted than a new man.

"Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many," is the practical wisdom approved by the Saviour. The Honorable Mr. Springer teaches us that he who has been faithful over all things for 8 years should be trusted with nothing thereafter. The world will make a mistake if it shall turn from Jesus of Nazareth to follow Mr. Springer, of Illinois.

When the Constitutional Convention had finally agreed to the plan of a President chosen for 4 years, and reeligible at the pleasure of the people, Mr. Alexander Hamilton said he liked the new modification on the whole better than that in the printed report. In this the President was a monster, elected for 7 years and ineligible afterward; having great powers in appointments to office, and continually tempted by this constitutional disqualification, to abuse them in order to subvert the Government. Mr. Springer's resolution resurrects the monster which Hamilton denounced, and which the Convention with such diligence buried.

The Constitution, as finally agreed to, was not satisfactory to every member of the Convention. Many refused to sign it. Each one of those distinguished gentlemen has left on record his reasons for refusing to sign the Constitution. But not one of them enumerates the reeligibility of the President as an objection to the instrument. Did the House of Representatives affirm a peril to our free institutions which does not exist, or did those clear-sighted cavilers, eager as they were to find fault, fail to see a peril which did not exist?

THIRD TERM BAN

The drive for a constitutional amendment limiting future Presidents to two terms has about it an atmosphere of political immaturity—a suggestion that the inheritors of the best political system in the world lack confidence in the essential foundation of their political structure.

It is probably true that, in the absence of unusual circumstances, the best interests of the country are served when a President does not serve more than two terms. There is nothing magical, of course, about two terms, and it is worth noting that the Senators and Representatives who are supporting the proposed amendment apparently see no inconsistency in having themselves reelected to as many successive terms as possible. Still, in the absence of exceptional conditions, an excellent argument can be made for the proposition that a President should serve two terms at most, and then turn the job over to someone else.

Implicit in this, however, is recognition of the fact that in some future grave emergency the national interests might be served best by continuing a President in office for more than two terms, and the trouble with the proposed amendment is that it would make this virtually impossible. There are those who say that the amendment, if adopted, could always be repealed, but this is an argument which overlooks two things—first, the time element, and, second, the very important fact that a constitutional amendment, once adopted, cannot be repealed except by vote of two-thirds of the States. Thus, a decision which might be vital to all of the people could be controlled by the whims or the procrastination of 17 States.

The question which should be posed to the sponsors of the amendment is this: Why should we of this generation undertake to tie the hands of our children in any and all circumstances, none of which can be foreseen now? Surely, on the record of our own performance, we have no valid claim to the requisite wisdom. Why not permit them to make their own free decision in the light of conditions which they will have to face and which we cannot possibly anticipate? That is the essence of the democratic process, and we would pay ourselves a highly dubious compliment in undertaking to short circuit it. This amendment is one which should not pass, and the Star hopes that it will never be written into the Constitution.

[From the Congressional Digest]

THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION AND THE PRESIDENCY

I. WHAT THE CONSTITUTION PROVIDES

As finally adopted by the Convention and ratified by the States the Constitution contains the following provisions regarding the Presidency:

Article II, section 1, paragraph 1: The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows.

Article II, section 1, paragraph 2: Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

Article II, section 1, paragraph 3: The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their voters; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

Article II, section 1, paragraph 4: No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States, at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of 35 years, and been 14 years a resident within the United States.

Article II, section 1, paragraph 5: In the case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office the same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

Article II, section 4, paragraph 1: The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

II. THE CONVENTION AND THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

1787: On May 29 Edmund Randolph, Governor of Virginia, presented to the Constitutional Convention a plan of government consisting of 15 resolutions, No. 7 of which provided for a single executive "to be chosen by the national legislature for a term of —— years * * * to be ineligible a second time." The Randolph resolutions were known as the Virginia plan. On the same day a plan was presented by Charles Pinckney of South Carolina whereby the Executive was to be elected for a term of years (left blank in the resolution), and was to be reeligible. Both plans were referred to the Committee of the Whole.

On June 1 the question of instituting an executive was taken up by the convention. On a motion for a 7-year term, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and Virginia voted "aye"; Connecticut, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia voted "no." The vote of the Massachusetts delegates was divided and the motion was declared carried.

On June 2 a motion to make the Executive ineligible after 7 years was carried, 7 to 2. Ayes: Massachusetts, New York, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia; noes: Connecticut and Georgia. Divided: Pennsylvania.

On June 15 Mr. Patterson of New Jersey offered a substitute for the Randolph plan. Article 4 of the Patterson plan recommended the election of an executive to continue in office for a term of years and to be ineligible for a second time.

Alexander Hamilton of New York then proposed a plan, article 4 of which recommended that the supreme executive authority be vested in a "Governour" to be elected to serve during good behavior.

On June 19 the Randolph plan was reported by the Committee of the Whole. It provided that the Executive should be elected for a 7-year term and should be ineligible a second time. On July 17 an amendment striking out the provision for "ineligibility for a second time" was adopted by the convention by a 6 to 4 vote.

An amendment to strike out "7 years" with reeligibility and substitute "during good behavior" as the term of the Executive was defeated, but it was subsequently agreed to reconsider the vote the next day.

The subject was defeated thoroughly and several amendments were passed and later rejected.

One suggestion was that the Executive be elected for 20 years. A suggestion that the Executive be appointed by the National Legislature was opposed on the ground that the Executive would be too dependent on the Legislature and, in order to get rid of that dependence, the expedient of making him ineligible a second time had been proposed.

On July 25 the final action not having been taken in the meantime, the question of the selection of the Executive was again taken up. A motion that the Executive be chosen by the Legislature with the proviso that no person be eligible for more than 6 years in any 12 years was defeated by a 6 to 5 vote.

On July 26 it was moved that the report of the Committee of the Whole on the selection of the Executive be reinstated, viz. "That the Executive be appointed for 7 years and be ineligible a second time."

This motion was carried by a 7 to 3 vote.

The above motion related to the term of office only. The entire resolution, providing that a National Executive be instituted, to be chosen by the National Legislature for a term of 7 years and to be ineligible for a second time was then passed by a 7 to 3 vote. For it were New Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. Against it were Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. Virginia was divided. Massachusetts was not on the floor.

On July 26 the convention referred its proceedings (from July 23) to the Committee on Detail, and adjourned to meet again on Monday, August 6.

On August 6 the Committee on Detail reported the resolution, unchanged in its provisions regarding the 7-year term without reelection.

On August 24 article X, which contained the above resolution, was taken up.

On September 4 the Committee of Eleven, to which various resolutions had been referred, recommended that certain alterations be made to the report of the Committee of the Whole. Among the alterations suggested was the provision relating to the term of the Executive which, as reported from the Committee of Eleven, read: "He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years."

On September 5 the question of the selection of the Executive was debated, Messrs. Pinckney and Rutledge of South Carolina speaking against reeligibility to a second term.

On September 6 Mr. Hamilton said he had refrained from joining in the discussion because of his dislike of the proposed scheme of government in general, but as he intended to support the plan he wished to offer a few remarks. He favored reeligibility but felt that if the executive head were appointed by the Legislature he would be tempted to make use of corrupt influence to be continued in office. Therefore, it seemed to him peculiarly desirable that some other mode of election be devised.

A motion to make the term 7 and one to make it 6 years instead of 4, as suggested by the Committee of Eleven, were defeated.

On September 15 it was finally agreed that the President be chosen by an electoral college for 4 years, no limit as to reeligibility being fixed.

On September 17, 1787, the Constitution as engrossed and agreed upon was signed by all the members of the convention present except Messrs. Gerry of Massachusetts, and Mason and Randolph of Virginia.

EFFORTS IN CONGRESS TO CHANGE THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM, 1800–1928

1788: On April 23, Washington wrote a letter to Lafayette in which he stated that he differed widely from Jefferson as to the necessity or expediency of rotation in the executive department and that he could see no propriety "in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who, in some great emergency, shall be decreed universally most capable of serving the public."

1788: On May 2, 1788, Thomas Jefferson wrote to Washington that he felt great concern on account of the possible reeligibility of the President under the Constitution. "This, I fear, will make an office for life." Jefferson advocated a constitutional amendment which would fix the Presidential term at 7 years and declare the President ineligible for reelection.

1796: Washington published his Farewell Address on September 17, 1796, in which he expressed his desire to retire and not be a candidate for another term.

1800: The election of 1800 was thrown into Congress since Jefferson and Burr received an equal number of electoral votes. Jefferson was chosen President by the House and Aaron Burr became Vice President.

1803: Following the contested election of 1800, resolutions were introduced in Congress recommending constitutional amendments against a third term. Among these was a resolution debated in the Senate in 1803, "that no person who has been twice successively elected President shall be eligible as President until 4 years elapse, when he may be eligible to office for 4 years and no longer." The resolution was rejected in the Senate by a vote of 4 to 25.

1804: On September 25, 1804, the twelfth amendment was ratified and adopted, which provided for the separate election of the President and Vice President. There was no attempt made in this amendment to provide for a limitation of reeligibility of the President.

1807: On December 10, 1807, Jefferson wrote a letter to the Vermont Legislature in which he repeated the fear that if the Constitution or some precedent did not fix the Presidential term it might become an inherited office.

1809: Madison followed Jefferson, and also held office for two terms, after which he voluntarily retired.

1824: Monroe, who followed Madison for two terms, also retired voluntarily.

1824: In this year the Senate passed a joint resolution by a vote of 36 to 3 providing that no man should be chosen President for more than two terms. No action was taken on this resolution in the House.

1824: The Presidential election of 1824 was again thrown into Congress, and John Quincy Adams was chosen President by the House. He served only one term.

1826: The contested election of 1824 produced a great many joint resolutions recommending amendments to the Constitution on the method of election of the President and the Presidential term. Thirty-eight had to do with the choice of Presidential electors. Ten were intended to limit the President to one term, some of 4, some of 6 years.

1826: One of these Senate resolutions, recommending a limit of two terms for the President, was passed by the Senate by a vote of 32 to 7. Nothing was done on the resolution, however, in the House.

1828: Andrew Jackson was elected in 1828 and reelected in 1832. In his first annual message to Congress, in 1829, he recommended that the electoral college be abolished, that the President be elected by direct vote, and that the President be limited to a single term of either 4 or 6 years. This recommendation was repeated by him in subsequent annual messages to Congress.

During his administration and following his recommendations 21 joint resolutions were introduced in Congress, dealing with a limitation of the Presidential term. Some of these recommended a single term of 4 or 6 years, others provided against a third term and still others against more than two consecutive terms. None of these was acted upon by Congress.

1836: In Van Buren's administration 10 one-term joint resolutions were presented in Congress upon which no action was taken.

1840: Harrison was elected in 1840. In his first inaugural speech in 1841 he affirmed his recommendation for a single Presidential term, and said in conclusion: "Under no circumstances will I consent to serve a second term."

President Harrison died a month later, in April 1841, and Vice President Tyler became President. He was the first Vice President to become President.

1841: In 1841 the legislatures of 8 States, Vermont, Indiana, Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island sent one-term amendments to Congress.

1842: In 1842 the Legislature of Kentucky sent a one-term amendment to Congress.

1844: In 1844 the Whig Party inserted a one-term plank in its Baltimore platform.

1860: Lincoln was elected.

1864: Lincoln was reelected.

1865: President Lincoln was assassinated and was succeeded by Vice President Johnson.

Johnson suggested in a special message to Congress a single term for the President. During his administration 12 joint resolutions recommending single Presidential terms were introduced in Congress, but no action was taken upon them.

1868: The question of the Presidential term was not an issue in the campaign of 1868, since the vote to impeach President Johnson was taken immediately before the meeting of the Republican Convention in that year. Ulysses S. Grant was nominated by the Republican Convention on the first ballot and elected.

1872: Grant was renominated in 1872. In this year the liberal Republican and the Democratic Parties, both of which nominated Greeley, demanded that the offices of the Government cease to be a matter of arbitrary favoritism and patronage and that to this end it is imperatively required that no President shall be a candidate for reelection.

1875: In 1875, when it became known that Grant would be a candidate for a third nomination, the State Republican conventions of Ohio, Iowa, Minnesota, Massachusetts, and New York, and Pennsylvania passed anti-third-term resolutions.

The action of the Pennsylvania convention elicited a reply from President Grant in which he stated that he never sought the office and did not wish a third term. He also stated, however, that the Constitution did not restrict the Presidential term to two terms, and that under certain circumstances it might be unfortunate to make a change at the end of 8 years.

1875: On December 15, 1875, the House passed a resolution, introduced by William M. Springer, of Illinois, Democrat. The resolution was adopted by the House without debate by a vote of 234 to 18, with 38 not voting. The resolution read:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this House the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the Presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

1875: On December 17, Horace Francis Page, of California, Republican, offered the following resolution in the House:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States, as framed by the fathers of the Republic, imposes no limit upon the eligibility of any citizen to the office of President further than that he shall be native-born and of a certain age and time of residence: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That in the judgment of this House the right of selecting candidates for the office of President can only be lawfully exercised by the people under existing constitutional restrictions, and has never been delegated by the people to the House of Representatives or to any Members of the same, and that any attempt by the House of Representatives to limit or forestall the public will on a question of such importance is an invasion of powers reserved to the people at large, to be freely exercised by them without any interference from any legislative body whatever."

Mr. Page's motion to bring this resolution to a vote was defeated by a vote of 30 against 89.

1876: President Hayes was elected in 1876 and in his first inaugural address in 1877 recommended an amendment to the Constitution limiting the President to a single term of 6 years.

1876: Again the Presidential election was thrown into the House, from which came the famous Hayes-Tilden election contest. After Hayes was chosen President, he recommended a single 6-year term for the President in his first inaugural address.

1877: In this year, Representative Springer offered another resolution embodying President Hayes' recommendation as to a single term and other reforms. No action was taken on the resolution because there could be no nomination of a candidate in 1880 who would have had two consecutive terms.

1880: In the Republican Convention of 1880 Grant was seriously considered for a third term, many people being of the opinion that the lapse of 4 years made Grant eligible without breaking the anti-third-term tradition. Grant led all other candidates on 33 ballots, but Garfield was finally nominated and elected.

President Garfield was assassinated in 1881 and Vice President Arthur became President.

1884: In 1884 the Democratic nominee, Grover Cleveland, was elected. In his address accepting the nomination he pointed out the dangers in the eligibility of a President for reelection.

1888: In this year Cleveland was renominated and defeated by the Republican candidate, Harrison, but was reelected in 1892.

1892: In this year the Populist Party platform contained a plank limiting the President to one term.

1892: During the period following Cleveland's reelection, 13 amendments were introduced in Congress to limit the Presidential term in various ways.

1894: In this year William Jennings Bryan, then a Member of the House, proposed three single-term amendments and one making a President ineligible to succeed himself.

1896: The Democratic platform of 1896, upon which Bryan ran for the Presidency, contained the following plank: "We declare it to be the unwritten law of this Republic, established by custom and usage of a hundred years, and sanctioned by the example of the greatest and wisest of those who founded and maintained our Government, that no man should be eligible for a third term of the Presidential office."

1896: McKinley was elected in 1896 and reelected in 1900. Soon after his second inauguration it was suggested that McKinley be considered for another reelection in 1904; that the only objection which might be urged against him was the anti-third-term feeling, but that this would amount to nothing, with a candidate who possessed the confidence of the country to the extent that Mr. McKinley did.

1901: On June 10, 1901, however, President McKinley issued the following public statement:

"I regret that the suggestion of a third term has been made. I doubt whether I am called upon to give to it notice, but there are new questions of the gravest importance before the administration and the country, and their just consideration should not be prejudiced in the public mind by even the suspicion of the thought of a third term. In view * * * of a long-settled conviction * * * I will not be a candidate for a third term."

President McKinley was assassinated in 1901 and was succeeded by Vice President Roosevelt.

1904: President Roosevelt was elected in 1904. On November 8, election day, after his election had been conceded, he made the following statement to the press:

"On the 4th of March next I shall have served 3½ years, and these 3½ years constitute my first term. The wise custom which limits the President to two terms regards the substance, and not the form, and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination."

1908: President Roosevelt was followed by President Taft in 1908.

1912: On February 25, 1912, when the progressive wing of the Republican Party began opposing the renomination of Taft and urged Roosevelt to become a candidate, Roosevelt wrote:

"I will accept the nomination if it is tendered to me, and I will adhere to this decision until the convention has expressed its preference."

1912: The Democratic platform of 1912, on which Woodrow Wilson ran for the Presidency, contained a single-term plank as follows:

"We favor a single Presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle."

Mr. Wilson, however, who accepted the nomination, had written years before that "short terms which cut off the efficient as surely and as inexorably as the inefficient are quite as repugnant to republican as to monarchial rules of wisdom."

1912: On June 13, 1912, Mr. Clayton, Democrat, from the House Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a favorable report (No. 885) on House Joint Resolution 325, proposing a constitutional amendment limiting the President to a single 6-year term. No further action was taken on the resolution.

1912: During this period 21 amendments were introduced in Congress proposing a limitation on the Presidential term.

1913: On February 1, 1913, prior to the first inauguration of President Wilson, the Senate passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) by a vote of 47 to 23, known as the Works' resolution, providing for a constitutional amendment limiting the President to a single 6-year term. No action was taken on the resolution in the House.

In a letter to A. Mitchell Palmer, Democrat, a Member of the House from Pennsylvania, written while the Works' resolution was pending in the House, President Wilson stated that he did not approve of it "and that he would abide by the judgment of his party and the people as to whether he would be a candidate for reelection in 1916."

1916: In the election of 1916 the Prohibition Party adopted a plank recommending a single 6-year term.

1927: On February 21, Representative Fairchild, New York, Republican, offered the following constitutional amendment:

"No person shall be eligible to the office of President who has previously served two terms, whether by election or by succession due to the removal, death, resignation, or inability of the President where the term by succession shall have continued for a period of 2 years or more."

1927: On February 10, 1927, Representative Beck, Wisconsin, Republican, introduced a resolution practically the same as the Springer resolution of 1875, suggesting a constitutional amendment against a third term.

1927: On February 22, Senator La Follette introduced the corresponding resolution in the Senate.

No action was taken on any of these resolutions in the Sixty-ninth Congress.

1927: Several resolutions had been introduced in the Seventieth Congress, offering constitutional amendments to limit the Presidential term.

1928: The La Follette resolution was reintroduced on January 27, 1928, amended and passed by the Senate on February 10, 1928, by a vote of 56 to 26, as follows:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the Presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to a great deal of repetitious argument on the floor of the Senate in times past. I wish to congratulate my assiduous brother from West Virginia for accumulating so many Republican phrases which were used in days past when the shoe was on the other foot.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. Does the Senator infer from that that at such times the Republicans were misled?

Mr. WILEY. I shall come to that point in a moment.

Mr. President, some time ago I had occasion to ask someone in my office to look up the history of the debate in the past with respect to this question. I found that invariably the clamor for limitation of the term of President arose when a Republican President was in office, at which time the leading Democrats of the Nation were in favor of a constitutional amendment such as the one now before the Senate. I was asked whether I wanted my office force to gather that material for me, and I said no.

I want to call to the attention of Senators who are gracing their chairs on this occasion to the fact that the House passed the pending measure providing for the constitutional amendment by a vote of 285 to 121. I wish to say again, in order that much of what has been said here this afternoon will not be misunderstood by the occupants of the galleries, that no Senator, no matter how he votes today, thereby commits himself as to his position before his constituency. He is today only voting whether he is willing to submit the constitutional amendment to the representatives of the people in the legislatures of the Nation, or whether he does not trust them to decide the question. As I have stated on another occasion, the members of the legislatures, officers of government like ourselves, are closer to the people than we are. They represent small districts.

Mr. President, I say that our friends have forgotten a little bit of our constitutional history when they say that the founding fathers were altogether willing to proceed with the Constitution, without doing something more. I say that unless there had been a definite understanding that the Bill of Rights, as amendments to the Constitution, would be adopted, the Constitution would not have become the basic law of the country. The delegates from New York State and from other States would not have voted to adopt the Constitution unless assured that the Bill of Rights would be adopted.

Mr. President, what are we proposing to do now? We are trying to settle a question which has been agitating the people since the days of the framing of the Constitution. By presenting the so-called Tydings-Taft amendment we are taking the question out of politics, because under it the terms of the constitutional amendment shall not apply to the present President. If that amendment is adopted no one can successfully argue that the proposal has a political cast.

The basic reason for the overwhelming vote in the House is that the Members of the House have had their eyes opened to recent happenings on the stage of this world. The Reichstag in Germany was not able to control Hitler. The argument has been made that if Congress takes the action now proposed the result will be the creation of a Hitler. Some individuals see the matter black and some see it white.

Mr. President, are we willing to permit the legislatures of the States to decide this matter? Are we willing to let government officials who are closer to the people than we are vote on the constitutional amendment?

The impression I have gained from much that has been said on the floor of the Senate is that we, the Congress of the United States, were deciding whether there was to be an amendment to the Constitution. Congress could decide nothing of the kind. If we submit the question to the people, or to their representatives in the legislatures of the States, they will make the decision.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the able remarks of my friend the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], former Governor of that State. I remember on several occasions, when with others I visited the State, with what friendship we were entertained, and I remember the part the Senator from Florida took in entertaining us. In speaking of the limitation of the terms of the President he called it the Washington tradition. I want to say to my Democratic friends that such limitation is more than the Washington tradition. I further wish to say that we cannot shift responsibility respecting this matter by saying there is some politics back of it. Washington knew what he was about when he refused a third term. His great heir, Jefferson, knew what he was about when he did the same thing.

I have quoted what Jefferson said on the subject. He sensed what we in this day and generation sense. If we place for any great period of time authority in the hands of any one man, or, as President Roosevelt said, in the hands of a party, we will soon regret having done so. I wish to quote President Roosevelt's identical language:

> For one reason or another even a wisely led political party, given a long enough tenure of office, finally fails to express any longer the will of the people.

To paraphrase that language, if we give any one man or any group a clutch hold on the economy of the Nation—we talk about restraining trusts, and trusts are made up of men—or on the political life of the country, what happens? The will of the people is no longer expressed. Let us put it this way: Those placed in such a position of power no longer seek to preserve the liberties of the people. Every Member of the Senate remembers instances of that sort. A reading of history will bear it out. Continuance of power in the hands of an individual or a party over a considerable period of time made possible a Hitler, a Mussolini, and all the little Fascists. That, Mr. President, is the reason for the proposed constitutional amendment. The attempt to kick it out the window by insinuating that on former occasions men have argued, as we are arguing here today, for and against the proposal and have rejected it, seems to me to be quite unjustified, because those who argued the matter then had not lived through the First World War nor through the Second World War. Whether we should give the people, through their legislatures, the right to express themselves for or against the constitutional amendment is the issue.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the Senate may vote on the pending substitute amendment, and then vote on any other proposals which may be presented. I suggest the absence of a quorum unless some Senator desires to speak at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested, and the clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], as modified, to the committee amendment on page 2, beginning in line 4.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED], who is absent because of illness, is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], who is detained on committee business, is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. If the Senator from New Hampshire were present and voting he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] is absent because of illness. If present and voting he would vote "nay."

NOT VOTING—11

Barkley	Malone	Thomas, Utah
Bridges	O'Mahoney	Tobey

Hatch	Robertson, Wyo.

So Mr. MAGNUSON's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 1, begining in line 10.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the second committee amendment, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by the committee amendment on page 2, beginning in line 4 and extending down to and including line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

> No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than 2 years of a term to which some other person was elected President, shall be elected to the office of President more than once. But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, yesterday when we had a discussion on this general subject there were various objections to the committee amendment, and it seemed to me that we could reach an agreement on an amendment. I drafted this amendment yesterday and talked with the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], who approved the general theory of it. I have talked with other Senators on the other side of the aisle. It seems to me that my amendment represents a perfectly fair compromise of the differences of opinion which have developed during the debate. It provides, generally speaking, that a man who succeeds to the office of President from the Vice Presidency—and that is the intricate problem which faces us—shall have only one more term if he serves more than 2 years. In other words, if he has a complete Congress in his first term, he will then be eligible for one election to a 4-year term, and will be permitted to serve for at least 6 years. No man can be held to less than 6 years. On the other hand, if he has not a complete Congress, if he has held office less than 2 years, he may be reelected twice and may serve a total of 10 years minus 1 day.

The committee amendment, in effect, provides that a man might be limited to 5 years or might serve as long as 9 years. The amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] provides, in effect, that he should have at least 8 years and might have as much as 12 years, if the President died before he took office and he succeeded to the Presidency.

I think this is a reasonable and sensible compromise. Many persons believe there should be one 6-year Presidential term. Therefore, if by any chance the term is more than 6 years under any conceivable circumstances, we are not taking a radical step. On the other hand, I think a term of 12 years is too long. I think it is too much for a man's health, too much for the country, and involves the acquiring of too much power.

I should like to say, further, in order to make clear that this amendment is not in any way proposed as a partisan measure, that I have expressly excepted President Truman.

But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this Article was proposed by the Congress.

Any man who runs for the office of Vice President after this time will know that if the President dies within the first two years the Vice President can be elected President only once.

When President Truman was elected Vice President there was no limitation; and I think it is rather harsh to impose retroactively a limitation.

I hope very much that the Article as thus amended may meet with the approval of the committee and of those on the other side of the aisle who are interested in this particular question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I shall not speak on this amendment, but I shall speak on the joint resolution itself. I assume that whatever I say will not change any votes, but I desire to make my position clear and definite on what seems to me to be a very fundamental issue now confronting the Senate.

No matter how any Member of the Senate may vote upon the issue now pending before it, truthful men know that the breaking of the two-term precedent by Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1940 and the further shattering of the precedent by his reelection in 1944 are the basic reasons for seeking this constitutional amendment. Partisan inspiration has decreed that that shall not happen again.

It is most unfortunate that such a great issue has to be meshed into the wheels of partisan politics. The swift and speedy manner in which this measure passed the House of Representatives, with every Republican voting for it, is a tragic lesson in governmental decay, rather than progress, in the only true representative democracy in all the world.

What Senator supporting this resolution will say that in his deliberations he has approached the issue as a practical problem of government? How many Senators have their judgment warped by partisan prejudice, as we seek to place definite limitations upon the sovereign rights of the people? Mr. President, hear me! Will Senators in this revolutionary step permit their dislikes of the moment to be woven into eternal principles that may be fateful to the Nation in some great future emergency?

Mr. President, many constitutional amendments have been proposed since our inception as a Nation. Whether introduced by a Democrat or a Republican, the fine hand of partisan politics was there. The only group which, when considering this question, was not prejudiced by personalities, was the founding fathers. It is with emphasis that I assert that the founding fathers had an advantage no Senator has today in determining the proper course of presidential tenure. They had no knowledge of prospective candidates, their views upon domestic or international issues, their character, or their political philosophy. The length of Presidential tenure, as found in the Constitution, was not decided upon the basis of the record of any man or political party. There was no hate, rancor, bitterness, or prejudice dealing with Presidential personalities in their long and mature deliberations.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not wish to yield until I conclude, but I shall yield at this time.

Mr. BALDWIN. I wish to ask one question. I understand that the Senator from Illinois charges partisan politics in connection with this proposed constitutional amendment. Why was it that George Washington himself stated to all the American people that he felt he should retire at the end of his second term? Was there partisan politics in that?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall answer the Senator as I proceed with my speech. In it I quote George Washington. The Senator admitted the other day, in the course of the debate, that partisan politics was involved in this matter; and he praised the very fact that there was partisan politics in it, as I recall.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, I submit that the Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I do not yield further. After I finish my speech I shall be glad to debate this point with the Senator all afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I boldly assert that of all the men who have considered Presidential tenure, only the founding fathers were fair and impartial. Yet here in a moment of emotionalism, a moment of power, a moment of prejudice, resulting from the 1946 Republican victory, we are called upon to enact for the first time a dangerous and far-reaching piece of legislation which strikes at the very heart of representative democracy. We are asked to repudiate the findings of the founding fathers. We are about to say they were wrong. We are about to say they committed a grievous error in not limiting the rights of the sovereign people. We propose to whittle away a sacred right guaranteed by the very document we now seek to amend, a document that was described by the Englishman Gladstone as the greatest of its kind that was ever struck off at a given time by the pen and brain of man.

Mr. President, it must be remembered that George Washington, the father and savior of this country, was Chairman of the Constitutional Convention. He heard all the arguments, pro and con. Not once did he protest against the reeligibility question. He was in complete agreement with the "no limitation" clause on tenure. In all our history no one has expressed himself so clearly upon this question as did George Washington, when he said:

> Under the extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man, who, on some great emergency, shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

There lies the meat of the coconut in respect to all of these arguments. Washington, the man of vision, courage, and capacity, thinking only in the terms of his country, foresaw the hour when a great emergency might arise, when the people would want to continue their Chief Executive in office for a third term. That hour did arrive in November 1940, and the people followed the advice of George Washington.

Mr. President, Washington did not fear dictatorship. The Colonies a few years before had been ruled by a king. Stupid despots and brutal kings were scattered around the earth. He and his contemporaries were familiar with the disadvantages and dangers of living under a powerful long-time executive. The Constitution was written in the midst of these vivid realities. These far-seeing men were anxious to guard against a monarchical form of tenure. A century and a half of progress and happiness under no constitutional strictures of tenure should be the complete and final answer to those seeking this constitutional limitation.

There has never been a dictatorship in this country. There never will be, as long as we have free elections. I respectfully submit that to deny the people of the Nation a free choice in the election of a President of the United States for a third or fourth term is a limitation on the people's sovereignty which in a great emergency might lead to a dictatorship. I seriously submit that in an hour of pressing danger a true, experienced, and tried Executive could well prevail over respect for the Constitution. Obviously, if such should happen, the Republic would be gone. Yet by this very constitutional amendment, we place temptation in the governmental highway of the future.

Mr. President, this Government belongs to the people. If they want to continue a Chief Executive in his office, who has a better right to do so? Who are we to say that the wisdom of the men of tomorrow will be inferior to the wisdom we possess? What right have we to say that the citizens of 50 years from now would not be capable of giving weight to the value of tested leadership in time of war or other international or domestic emergency? What omnipotent power do we possess which gives us the right to deny the citizens of tomorrow freedom of choice and freedom of action? I have always understood that a true and a progressive democracy overlooked no opportunity to expand the rights of the people. Certainly this amendment violates that fundamental concept. Every constitutional amendment except one—the prohibition amendment—was for the benefit of the people, and that amendment was ultimately repealed.

Mr. President, we know that for 150 years we have survived successfully under the process of democratic government. We know through that experience that the longer a man continues in elective office in this country the less chance he has of being elected. Franklin D. Roosevelt's majorities progressively declined, rather than increased, following his second election, even though the third came at a time of great international emergency, and the fourth in the midst of a war. The desire among the American people for change is strong. On the question of Presidential tenure the people can and ought to be trusted to decide when to make an exception. The fact that no man in a democracy is indispensable does not validate a restriction of the people's right to express their preference. The guarding of that right is the surest guarantee of the preservation of democracy.

Mr. President, I ask the attention of the present occupant of the chair to what I am about to say. In doing some research work upon Presidential tenure I came across an article written by the present distinguished occupant of the chair, the President pro tempore, prepared for Liberty magazine for October 1939. The ideas expressed in the article so coincide with mine that I cannot help quoting it for the benefit of the RECORD and the Senate.

I wish to say to the distinguished Senator from Michigan that I sometimes wonder how frequently I find myself agreeing with him on many important questions which have arisen in the Senate from time to time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may say to the Senator that the Chair is always enlightened by the Senator from Illinois, even when he is speaking on his own, and not quoting the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator. I shall now quote briefly from what the Senator from Michigan said in the article to which I have referred. At the time this article was written many of his friends were certain he would be the candidate for the Republican nomination for President, which later proved to be an accurate bit of speculation.

Notwithstanding the Senator's high position in the Republican Party in 1939, he approached the third-term issue as a practical problem of government, with a complete understanding of our history and traditions. Had his article been written for political reasons at that particular time, he could have cried "dictatorship" and "the fall of the Republic," that old, familiar Republican theme song I have heard so often. But he was too big a man to deal with phony issues, and that is why he stands where he is today; and I say that in all seriousness.

At this late hour I congratulate the Senator upon carrying this discussion upon such a high plane. There is truth, logic, eloquence, and statesmanship in the article, and I wish to read a few excerpts from it. The Senator from Michigan said:

I want to say for myself that I doubt the wisdom of attempting to change the tenure or to limit it by constitutional amendment. I think these decisions should be left to the patriotic and vigilant American conscience. This in no sense can undermine the good faith of my own one-term proposal, because, as I have previously said, no new constitutional restraints could possibly reach the Constitution by 1940 anyway.

Who shall say that a tradition and a habit against a prolonged Presidency on the one hand, or freedom of action in behalf of a shorter prepledged Presidency on the other hand, is not better and safer than a constitutional stricture which could not be changed to fit one emergency or the other? The one is elastic under pressure of necessity; the other is a self-made barrier—erected by the people against themselves—which is as insurmountable as, in some crises, it might be fatal.

In the presence of 1940, the people are free to elect Mr. Roosevelt for a third term if they wish. They are equally free to choose a prepledged one-term successor to him—or an unpledged two-term successor—if they wish. And since this is their Government—

I am still quoting from the distinguished Senator from Michigan, who now presides over the Senate—

And since this is their Government, it is illogical to tie their freedom of action.

That is what I have been preaching all during this debate, that it is illogical to tie the freedom of choice and the freedom of action of the American people who have been trusted with our Government for 150 years, and have done a pretty good job of it.

The very fact that proposed constitutional strictures of one sort and another have always excited violent differences of opinion, and have always failed to jell, is the best possible proof that there never could be permanent assurance that any one particular constitutional stricture would fit the changing vicissitudes of time and popular opinion.

The Senator from Michigan further said:

Well, there you are. We have had great varieties of Presidential tenure, thanks to constitutional freedom in respect to it. I think it is probably wisest that both the freedom and the variety should continue. No one can conclusively say precisely how long any one citizen should claim the White House for his home.

That is correct. I quote further from the Senator from Michigan:

When Lincoln was asked how long a man's legs ought to be, he replied, "Long enough to reach the ground." That's the safest sort of answer to the question, how long the Presidential tenure ought to be. It ought to be long enough—or short enough—to fit the necessities of the contemporary moment.

Mr. President, I say with the utmost sincerity that this is the greatest thesis upon this question I have been able to find or read in my study, in the Congressional Library or anywhere else.

Further, the able Senator from Michigan said:

We may safely leave the decision to the wisdom of the American people. That has been spectacularly true for 150 years. It still will be true in 1940.

In order that I may not do the Senator from Michigan any injustice whatever, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in my remarks the entire article be printed in the RECORD, and I hope that regardless of how the vote goes, every Member of the Senate will find time, in the busy days ahead, to read the article which the able Senator from Michigan wrote for Liberty magazine in 1939.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the order is made.

The article is as follows:

MR. ROOSEVELT AND THE THIRD-TERM DICTATORSHIP

(By Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG)

One term? Two terms? Three terms? How long should a President sit in the White House?

That is a burning question these days—and the chief reason it burns so hotly at the moment is the cryptic silence of one Franklin Delano Roosevelt regarding his intentions. One hundred and fifty years ago the world was full of kings—and we didn't like 'em. Today the world is full of dictators—and we don't like 'em. So we simply run true to form when we are critical of self-perpetuating Chief Executives. They just don't fit our pattern of democracy—and democracy is particularly sensitive to its hazards in this era of personal government all round the globe, not excluding Washington, D. C.

So the folks are talking it over and disagreeing on the subject—just as they talked and disagreed in the Constitutional Convention, just as they have talked and disagreed periodically in the story of the Nation whenever an extended lease on 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue has been proposed. But thus far they have never concluded that any one man is more indispensable to the Republic than was George Washington when he was fathering his country.

Once renewed, however, the debate never stops with a clinic which is content to take apart the particular ego of the moment. It promptly leaps from the specific to the general theme—from the contemporary man on horseback to all men and all horses—and it always periodically proposes to save future generations from recurrent menace with a law which shall stop all future Caesars from even flirting with an American crown, or its equivalent.

With nazism and fascism to the right of us, and communism to the left, and with government by Executive decree in possession of our own Capitol, it is small wonder that the present generation plunges into the debate with poignant avidity. Yes; and it ought to plunge, because the White House tenure is inseverably linked with the maintenance of our republican institutions.

If a President, with all his normal power, ever gets the extraordinary power which will attach to him when he has once successfully crossed the traditional barrier against a third term, a fourth term, and a fifth, and more, will be progressively and relatively simple achievements. The imperial state of mind which leads him to attribute indispensability to himself at the third hurdle will fatten to a conviction as to his own divinity at the fourth and fifth. Meanwhile his royal retinue—each knowing exactly what he wants—will beat the drums. But they will be the drums of doom for American democracy; because a perpetuated President, no matter how nobly mediated his imperial self-sacrifice, will be a despot in the making.

And you can't blame the despot. Any time 130,000,000 people tell one mortal man that they can no longer find another among the remaining 129,999,999 to carry on the American system in the American tradition, it is their fault and not his if his delusions of grandeur transport him to Olympus. If a President can so mistake his pontifical authority at the end of 6 years as to run a purge of all his own partisans who dare to disagree with his dicta, what would he run at the end of 12?

Millions of Americans who immensely like the dynamic, magnetic F. D. R. would not vote him a third term in the White House—not because they love him less, but because they love traditional American institutions and the spirit of democracy more. He is the last man who should be the one to break the third-term tradition—if it is ever broken—because he is already the nearest personification of personal government in the United States that we have ever had in peace or war. He is a superlatively powerful personal character. He is a ruthless disciplinarian in matters of loyalty to his personal programs. I venture the assertion that his state papers contain more personal pronouns than any six of his predecessors' combined, not even excepting his illustrious predecessor of the same name. He believes in Executive domination—as frankly confessed by his campaigns to tie courts and legislatures to his chariot wheel. He is intolerant of opposition. He believes in his own star of destiny. His judgments are pronounced with autocratic finality. Were he the greatest President we have ever had—which his satellites will freely concede—still he would supremely personify as no other could what the Senate had in mind when it adopted the La Follette resolution in 1928 by a vote of 56 to 26, and said:

"It is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents in retiring from the Presidential office after their second term has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

Well, if that stricture could apply to a gentle, peaceful, unambitious Coolidge, what language could be mustered to fit the suggestion of a third term for his complete antithesis in the midst of "bread and circuses," who has himself bluntly asserted that he has "created instrumentalities of power" which, in what he conceives to be wrong hands, would "shackle the liberties of the people"? If it was "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions" for the safe and silent and conservative Coolidge to extend his presidential term in a time which knew little of the psychology of dictatorship, what anathema could freedom conjure to describe the challenge to the present tumultuous hour?

Mind you, we are not now discussing the quality of Mr. Roosevelt's two administrations—we are discussing a system of government: the republican institutions of democracy of which a limited presidency—limited by the voluntary fidelities of a century and a half of American tradition—is the supreme symbol, if not the supreme necessity.

Mind you, too, I am not arguing with the President. I expect his patriotism to agree with these contentions. I am arguing, if at all, with those of his noisy camp followers who persistently call him to a third term—sometimes even embracing the amazing sophistry of pretending that it would only be his first term if he were reelected in 1940, because he was robbed of his 1933–36 authority by a recalcitrant Supreme Court—which he has subsequently peopled with sympathetic souls; and robbed of his 1936–40 authority by a party rebellion—which increases its record for larceny the nearer we get to the next great showdown. On that basis, he wouldn't get his second term until 1944, his third until 1948, and—well, page the spirit of Porfirio Diaz. He might quit in 1952 or he might not.

Silly? Yes. But could anything more clearly demonstrate the danger of such infatuation? Is it any wonder that most analytical Americans gratefully cherish the precedent set by George Washington and underwritten by Thomas Jefferson—whom today's New Dealers love to embrace as their progenitor—when he said in a letter to a friend:

"If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will in fact become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing that a representative government responsible at short periods of election is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the first person who * * * should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office."

It would be more in keeping with Jeffersonian doctrine than are most of the other innovations which have been clamped upon the country during the last few years in his great name if next winter's annual Jeffersonian dinners (which replenish contemporary political coffers at $100 a plate) should paint a slogan on their walls recalling the words of Jefferson's party, in response to their first President's self-renunciation, acclaiming "the manly and sublime effort which dictated your determination," and significantly deriving "consolation from the consideration that your example may operate on all future Presidents to pursue a course which has added luster to your character, already dear to liberty and your country."

I respectfully suggest to the distinguished President of the United States that nothing would be more fitting or more thrilling than that he should take advantage of next winter's Jefferson dinners to announce his own allegiance to this doctrine. Or the Jackson day dinners (also used for contemporary fiscal rehabilitation) would be equally appropriate, because Old Hickory (another claimed New Deal ancestor) asked in each of his eight annual messages that Presidents be constitutionally limited to one term.

Lest my suggestion be misconstrued by Charley Michaelson, the President's inimitably agile publicity director—who recently said that "It would clarify the present political situation if anybody could tell whether the GOP, its allies and affiliates, were more scared that the President would run for a third term than that he would not run," I must add parenthetically, for myself, that I think he would be the most vulnerable nominee, as a third-term nominee, whom "the GOP, its allies and affiliates" could confront.

This problem is something infinitely more vital than whether somebody is scared or not. It goes to the roots of American institutions. From a purely political standpoint, many of us would confidently welcome the President's renomination for a third term as most clearly personifying the issues which the country must settle at the November polls in 1940. But from the standpoint of American institutional values, it would be happier to have the issue voluntarily settled in advance by the eloquent action of a great and powerful President himself. At any rate, I have the complete conviction that it will be settled—by whichever process—in favor of the Washington-Jefferson precedent which has been impregnable for 150 years. The spirit of democracy is not yet ready for a rendezvous with disintegration.

But we were saying that each time this third-term issue arises the debate always resurrects the age-old contentions about limiting the Presidential tenure by constitutional amendment. Some earnest souls propose a limitation at one term of 7 years. Others propose a general limitation to two terms; others, one term of 6 years, as recently suggested in a split report of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Then there is a further suggestion, applicable to the immediate 1940 prospectus, which I submitted to my fellow countrymen in a statement last May, and which would prepledge the next Republican nominee to one 4-year term. It has nothing to do with any constitutional change. No constitutional change could possibly become effective, even in the doubtful event that one could be agreed upon, in time to control the President who will be inaugurated in January 1941. Whatever happens in respect to the next President's tenure will still have to happen voluntarily (as is the theory of the existing Constitution). Obviously, this suggestion has nothing to do with Mr. Roosevelt's tenure except as it is predicated upon his retirement or defeat.

I want to discuss this suggestion for a moment. I do not presume to infer that it deserves to be bracketed with other illustrious comments which I have been quoting. But perhaps it merits attention, because I have received 3,912 separate newspaper editorials, pro and con (80 percent pro), upon it.

On May 26, in a discussion of the next Republican Presidential nomination, I said this:

"The next Republican national convention must first set down clean-cut, constructive, courageous principles which dependably promise to save the American system of free enterprise under the renewed spirit of constitutional democracy and to recapture prosperity for our whole people under a government restored to solvency. Then it should fit its nominations to its principles. It must strive to create common ground upon which all like thinkers may unite to produce an administration for all Americans in which a prepledged one-term President is manifestly free of all incentive but the one job of saving America."

It's the tenure which is important to this thesis. One prepledged term.

Why? Because if a Republican President should be elected in 1940, he will not have been elected merely by Republican votes. There is a sector of voters in this country—sufficient to dominate the 1940 outcome—which does not care a fig what party wins, so long as America wins. It was a solidified opposition to the Roosevelt party, regardless of previous partisan affiliations, which gave republicanism its great stimulus last November. It will be a solidified opposition which will carry it to victory, if at all, in November 1940. Like Lincoln's triumph in 1864, it will be a coalition victory utilizing the machinery of the Republican Party. It will demand a subsequent administration in kindred spirit—which is to say, an all-American administration "manifestly free of all incentive but the one job of saving America." The surest warrant for this outcome will be a prepledged one-term President (who means what he says) who can face the hard decisions which are the price of our emancipation not only without the hampering hobbles of political self-preservation to hold him back, but also without the sinister and destructive suspicious of his needed allies that they are helping to perpetuate a partisan dynasty.

Now let's get back to the abstract question of the Presidential tenure. Here are the two antithetical extremes: On the one hand, three terms for Roosevelt; on the other hand, one term of 4 years for his successor. In between lie the other possibilities—perhaps two 4-year terms, as is the orthodox routine for acceptable Presidents; perhaps a constitutional amendment determining once and for all upon one 6-year term.

But, in spite of my deep conviction that no circumstance yet confronted in American experience could justify a third 4-year term for any President, I want to say for myself that I doubt the wisdom of attempting to change the tenure or to limit it by constitutional amendment. I think these decisions should be left to the patriotic and vigilant American conscience. This in no sense can undermine the good faith of my own one-term proposal, because, as I have previously said, no new constitutional restraints could possibly reach the Constitution by 1940 anyway.

Who shall say that a tradition and a habit against a prolonged Presidency on the one hand, or freedom of action in behalf of a shorter prepledged Presidency on the other hand, is not better and safer than a constitutional stricture which could not be changed to fit one emergency or the other? The one is elastic under pressure of necessity; the other is a self-made barrier—erected by the people against themselves—which is as insurmountable as, in some crises, it might be fatal.

In the presence of 1940, the people are free to elect Mr. Roosevelt for a third term if they wish. They are equally free to choose a prepledged one-term successor to him—or an unpledged two-term successor—if they wish. And since this is their Government, it is illogical to tie their freedom of action. The very fact that proposed constitutional strictures of one sort and another have always excited violent differences of opinion, and have always failed to jell, is the best possible proof that there never could be permanent assurance that any one particular constitutional stricture would fit the changing vicissitudes of time and popular opinion.

Thus far it has always been perfectly safe to leave the decision to the people. So far as the third-term menace is concerned, it probably loomed largest in the person of President Grant. This produced the famous Springer resolution of 1875 in the House of Representatives, when the House, by the overwhelming vote of 234 to 18, resolved that no third term was a fundamental rule of the unwritten law of the Republic. Incidentally, it is significant to note that Grant was succeeded by a prepledged one-termer, President Hayes.

Eight Presidents have held office for two full terms. Two (Lincoln and McKinley) were elected to two terms but were cut down by assassination. Two (Theodore Roosevelt and Coolidge) passed from second to first place and served out full terms subsequently. Of the 14 Presidents who completed a single term, only three (Polk, Buchanan, and Hayes) really made no effort to succeed themselves.

Theodore Roosevelt, when first assuming the Presidency, felt the antithird-term tradition so keenly that he counted the 3½ years of his succession to the martyred McKinley as a full term and said: "The wise custom which limits the President to two terms regards the substance, and not the form, and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for, or accept, another nomination." In 1912, after 4 years' absence from the White House, he altered his doctrine to the extent of saying that the anti-third-term tradition runs against three consecutive terms. He ran again as a nonconsecutive third-termer, and was defeated. If he had lived until 1920, he would probably have been renominated and he would probably have been elected as a nonconsecutive third-termer. Thus the tradition would have been slightly bent if not actually broken. But the fact remains that it wasn't. The disturbing fact also remains that the second Roosevelt likes nothing better than to try to out-Roosevelt the first Roosevelt.

Well, there you are. We have had great varieties of Presidential tenure—thanks to constitutional freedom in respect to it. I think it is probably wisest that both the freedom and the variety should continue. No one can conclusively say precisely how long any one citizen should claim the White House for his home. When Lincoln was asked how long a man's legs ought to be, he replied: "Long enough to reach the ground." That's the safest sort of answer to the question how long the Presidential tenure ought to be. It ought to be long enough—or short enough—to fit the necessities of the contemporary moment.

We may safely leave the decision to the wisdom of the American people. That has been spectacularly true for 150 years. It will still be true in 1940. I have my own ideas what they will say. They may choose a new President, Republican or Democrat, who is a first-termer without restrictive commitment for the future. They may choose a prepledged one-termer because of the immediate exigency. But they will not choose a third-termer at this particular moment, when an upset world finds personal dictators at the throat of democracy and individual liberty all round the globe. They will not hazard an American paraphrase of this tragedy. And one reason they won't is that they probably will not have the chance. Any other eventuality would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years, and together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, be nominated and elected as hereinafter provided. No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than 2 years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

"SEC. 2. The official candidates of political parties for President and Vice President shall be nominated at a primary election by direct vote of the qualified voters who are members of the respective political parties in the several States. The time of such primary election shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different day, such primary election shall be held on the first Wednesday after the first Monday in June in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of President and Vice President. Persons voting in primaries for candidates for President and Vice President in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature of such State, and shall have been members of their respective political parties for not less than 6 months prior to the holding of such primaries.

"The names which shall appear in each of the States on the primary ballots for candidates of the respective political parties shall be only of those persons who shall have filed petitions at the seat of the Government of the United States with the Secretary of State. Such petitions shall be valid only if filed at least 60 days prior to the day of primary election and if signed by qualified voters in any or all of the several States, equal in number to at least one-tenth of 1 percent of the total number of popular votes cast throughout the United States for all candidates for President (or, in the case of the primary election first held after the ratification of this article, for electors of President and Vice President) in the most recent previous Presidential election.

"SEC. 3. Within 30 days after such primary election, the chief executive of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons of each political party, for whom votes were cast, and the number of votes for each such person, which lists shall be signed, certified, and transmitted under the seal of such State to the seat of government of the United States, directed to the Secretary of State who shall open all certificates and count the votes. The person receiving the greatest aggregate number of popular votes of any party for candidate for President shall be the official candidate of such party, throughout the United States, for President; and the person receiving the greatest aggregate number of popular votes of any party for candidate for Vice President shall be the official candidate of such party, throughout the United States, for Vice President.

"SEC. 4. In the event of the death or resignation of the official candidate of any political party for President, the person nominated by such political party for Vice President shall be the official candidate of such party for President. In the event of the death or resignation of the official candidate of any political party for Vice President, a national committee of such party shall designate a candidate for Vice President who shall then be deemed the official candidate for Vice President of such party, but in choosing such candidate the vote shall be taken by States, the delegation from each State having one vote. A quorum for such purpose shall consist of a delegate or delegates from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all States shall be necessary to a choice.

"SEC. 5. The electoral college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States is hereby abolished. The President and Vice President shall be elected by the people of the several States as shall be determined by direct vote of the qualified voters at a general election. The time of such election in each State shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different day, such election shall be held on the first Wednesday after the first Monday in November in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of the President and Vice President. The voters in each State shall vote directly for President and Vice President and shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. The names of candidates officially nominated in primaries as herein provided, and in addition the names of any independent candidates, shall appear in every State upon the official ballot for the offices of President and Vice President, but names of any such independent candidates shall so appear only following the filing with the Secretary of State of the United States, at least 60 days prior to the day of the election, of petitions signed by qualified voters in any or all of the several States, equal in number to at least one-half of 1 percent of the total number of popular votes cast throughout the United States for all candidates for President.

"SEC. 6. Within 30 days after such election, the chief executive of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons receiving votes for President and all persons receiving votes for Vice President, and the number of votes cast in such State for each, which lists shall be signed, certified, and transmitted under the seal of such State to the seat of government of the United States directed to the President of the Senate. The Congress shall be in session on the 6th day of January, or if such day shall fall on Sunday on the 7th day of January, and on that day the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest aggregate number of popular votes for President shall be President, and the person having the greatest aggregate number of popular votes for Vice President shall be Vice President. No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

"SEC. 7. In the event that it is shown by such certificates that the two persons receiving the greatest number of votes for President have received an equal number of such votes, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. In choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. If the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 20th day of January next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of death or other constitutional disability of the President. In the event that it is shown by such certificates that the two persons receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice President have received an equal number of such votes, the Senate shall choose the Vice President. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

"SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to provide by appropriate legislation for methods of determining any dispute or controversy that may arise in the counting and canvassing of votes for President and Vice President in any such primary or general election. The places and manner of holding such primary or general election shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to prevent fraud and corrupt practices in connection with such primary or general elections.

"SEC. 9. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States as provided in the Constitution within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, this amendment is substantially the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the late Senator George Norris. As Senators who were here at that time will remember, the question was debated for several weeks.

For many days we have been hearing a great deal on the floor of the Senate about true democracy. We have been hearing a great deal about having the people of the country rule. Every Senator is familiar with the fact that only a comparatively short time ago even Governors were not elected by the people, but were appointed. I remember when United States Senators were not elected by the people, but were elected by the legislatures of the various States. It was stated that if the time ever came when the people elected Senators directly, instead of having them chosen by the legislatures, we would get a very poor quality of United States Senators. Yet it seems to me that we have got along pretty well since that amendment was adopted.

Who today selects candidates for President of the United States? Several years ago I was in North Dakota and picked up a copy of the Minneapolis Tribune. The Republican National Convention was then in progress. In large type it was stated in that newspaper that the Republican Convention was unable to proceed because Andrew Mellon was not able to be present that day. The statement was made that it could not be told who was to be chosen as the candidate of the Republican Party until Andrew Mellon gave the word. That information was on the front page of the Minneapolis Tribune.

I remember when Hiram Johnson was a candidate for the Presidency. At that time I was a member of the committee in my State which was advocating his candidacy. Hiram Johnson went to Chicago. I remember the interview which he gave at that time. The balloting commenced, and he said that the outcome depended entirely upon what Boies Penrose and Philander C. Knox would do.

There is hardly a Member of this body who does not remember the famous Lowden-Wood fight, in which it was charged that delegates were openly purchased, and that sums up to $100,000 were paid for delegates. At that time there was a scandal which finally resulted in the elimination of both Frank O. Lowden and General Wood. I remember that in all the newspapers of any size, at the time Mr. Johnson was a candidate, it was finally announced that a small group of men had met in a smoke-filled room in Chicago and there, in the dead of night, secretly had selected Warren G. Harding to be the candidate for President. It was announced in the morning, even before the convention met, that Mr. Harding would be the candidate.

In connection with the forthcoming convention, the announcement has already been made in the newspapers that seven delegates to the Republican Convention have already been lined up. I do not know whether that is true or not. However, I have talked with a number of persons from Southern States, and it is my judgment that there is some truth to what has been said in that respect.

It seems to me that if the people of the country are fit to elect the mayors of their towns, if they are fit to select the governors of their States, if they are considered competent to select Members of Congress and United States Senators to represent them in Washington, certainly the people of the country can be trusted to select the candidates of the Republican Party as well as of the Democratic Party, or any other party, for the office of President.

What would it mean if we were to abolish the electoral college? We all remember the bitter and heated campaign of 1940, the campaign in which Franklin Roosevelt set out to break the no-third-term precedent. When the ballots were counted in November Mr. Roosevelt had polled 27,000,000 of the popular vote, and his Republican opponent, Wendell Willkie, rolled up a total of 22,000,000 votes, a difference of 5,000,000 in a total vote of 50,000,000. But note what happened when the electoral college got through with the fantastic formality of electing the President on the basis of electoral votes. If the electoral votes had been based proportionately on the popular vote, Willkie would have had 245 electoral votes, and Mr. Roosevelt would have had 286. Instead, Willkie actually received only 82 electoral votes, and Mr. Roosevelt received 449. Thus we see that the electoral college is not bound by any precept of the Constitution to reflect with any degree of accuracy the will of the people as expressed by the popular vote.

Substantially the same thing happened in 1944. Mr. Roosevelt had a popular majority of less than 3,000,000 votes over Dewey, but when the popular vote had been translated by the electoral college Mr. Roosevelt received 432 electoral votes as against Mr. Dewey's 99.

So it seems to me that the Senate would be doing only what I conceive to be its duty, and what I believe from the bottom of my heart to be absolutely right in a true democracy, by allowing the people to vote for whom they wish to be President of their country. Suppose that in the last election both candidates had been out-and-out isolationists. Then suppose, as has been alleged on this floor time and again, that the country had been in favor of intervention. There would have been no candidate for intervention. Under the proposed amendment that kind of a situation could not take place, because even if both candidates were out-and-out isolationists, there would still be a provision whereby those believing in intervention, by getting a sufficient number of names on a petition, would be able to have a candidate to represent their views.

So I hope from the bottom of my heart that this amendment may be adopted. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I question very much whether the Senate, with the little consideration it has given to this momentous subject, should vote for the pending amendment. The distinguished Senator from North Dakota is, next to the chairman, the ranking Republican on the committee. This question has never had the consideration of the committee. I have attended every meeting, and not once was the amendment proposed. Certainly it is a most revolutionary idea. That does not mean that, after due consideration, if the time were ripe for it, and if the proper mechanism could be devised, the committee would not give favorable consideration to the proposal. I cannot say as to that. However, the committee should at least consider the question. There was plenty of opportunity for consideration of the amendment. The measure which was reported was the result of a joint consultation of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], and the office force. The subcommittee had no opportunity to go into the question; the committee itself had no opportunity.

My friend from North Dakota referred to true democracy. This Government is not a democracy. It was never conceived of as a democracy. The democracies of the world were equivalent to town meetings on a nation-wide basis, as was Greece at one time. This Government is a government of checks and balances. That is why, in one sense, it is the oldest government on earth aside from Iceland. All other nations have changed their forms of government more or less.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that Senators, sensing the importance of the innovation suggested, without any question about what they would do under circumstances in which there might be true consultation and true investigation and then a report on the subject, should reject this suggestion.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. In the present state of the law, when the age qualification for voting is so different in various States, does it not occur to the Senator that that fact alone would operate as an insuperable obstacle to the successful operation of the proposal of the Senator from North Dakota in that it would not be fair to the people of the several States?

Mr. WILEY. I did not hear the full reading of the proposed substitute. However, I think I have in mind what the Senator has asked. That is a matter of mechanism which might be ironed out in the consideration of the subject by the committee.

Mr. HOLLAND. My question was this: In view of the fact that the age qualification for voting in some States is as low as 18 years and in most States it is 21 years, does it not occur to the Senator that that fact alone would serve as a very real objection to this proposal and would prevent it from being fair as between the people of the several States?

Mr. WILEY. The point the Senator is making is that it would give one State an undue advantage in relation to the number of voters?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes; exactly.

Mr. WILEY. I think that is something which should be considered in committee. There are many other questions. I should like to make one further point. It is true that through the years political machines have not always operated on the highest moral basis; but we also know that even under present conditions when primaries are held there are evil influences, not because of the primary, not because of the machine, but because of the inherent nature of mankind. I do not wish to get into an argument on that subject, because I doubt whether anyone, even the Senator from North Dakota, has given consideration to the various implications which might follow putting this system into operation.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I have given the question a great deal of study since submitting the proposal 2 years ago. I have had professors study it. I have gone over all the debates from the time when the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] discussed the question, particularly with the late Senator George Norris.

Mr. WILEY. When was the proposal first offered by Senator Norris?

Mr. LANGER. Nine or ten years ago, when he was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the position now occupied by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Senator Norris was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary longer ago than that. He was not chairman at any time the Democrats were in power. It must have been 14 or 15 years ago. I have been here more than 8 years, and I know that the matter was never discussed by this body.

Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say on the subject.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I am the cosponsor of this amendment with the distinguished senior Senator from North Dakota. I am not an old hand at politics, but as far back as I can remember I have heard people talk about politics. I have heard the average citizen question the wisdom of the electoral college method of electing Presidents, and ask why we do not vote for Presidents directly as we vote for other officials. I know that nominating conventions cannot represent the will of the people so well as the people themselves can in a direct primary or by voting directly for the candidates of their choice. As it is today, in any political convention the man seeking office does not have to seek the favor of the people in the first instance. He has to court the favor of politicians in many ways, and very often of special-interest groups. Economic special-interest groups can bring particular pressure to bear upon conventions, and one has to promise to behave in order to get their support. I feel that it would be much more democratic procedure for the people to nominate their candidates for President and Vice President directly. We would then have men who would not be bound by promises wrung from them in return for the support of various factions, groups, or special interests.

Under the present system there are so many electoral votes allotted to each State, and it does not matter whether the voters vote or not, the electoral votes are there. I certainly believe that a greater injustice in the matter of actual representation of the people who vote is done by that system than would result because of any difference in the age requirements of the various States, as was pointed out by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

So, Mr. President, I favor this amendment, and I hope it will prevail, because it is the most democratic procedure. I believe in democracy and in rule by the people insofar as that is humanly possible.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the majority leader what the program is from now on?

Mr. WILEY. If I may answer for the majority leader, my understanding is that we are to proceed through the evening to try to get a vote, and then proceed to the consideration of the portal-to-portal pay measure.

Mr. LUCAS. Are we to have a brief recess for dinner?

Mr. WILEY. As I understood the program announced the other day by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], there is to be a recess. That was the plan at that time.

Mr. LUCAS. The only reason I make the inquiry is that one Senator who talked to me did not know that there was to be a night session.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, of course we had hoped that the joint resolution might be finally disposed of this evening, probably by 5:30. If it is not so disposed of, my intention is to move to recess until 7 o'clock this evening and then resume the consideration of this matter; and if it is concluded within a reasonable time after reassembling at 7 o'clock, a motion will be made to make the portal-to-portal pay legislation the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think most of us understand all the amendments that have been proposed, including the pending amendment. I was wondering whether the majority leader would consider making a unanimous-consent request that at the hour of quarter of 6 the Senate proceed, without further debate, to vote on the pending amendment and all other amendments, until the joint resolution is finally disposed of.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I should feel obliged to object if such a request were made.

Mr. TYDINGS. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I was about to say that I have had sufficient experience in the Senate to realize that it is not easy to secure agreement on a time for voting, and I would not wish to make such a request.

Mr. WILEY. May we have a vote, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOPER in the chair). The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR]. The Senator from North Dakota has requested the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, inasmuch as the yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution as amended. On this question the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ELLENDER (when Mr. OVERTON's name was called). My distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] was compelled to leave the Chamber because of illness. He authorized me to announce that if present and voting, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHITE. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED], who is absent because of illness, is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN] is necessarily absent on committee business. If present and voting, he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] is absent on official business.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] is necessarily absent. If present and voting he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] are absent because of illness.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] is detained on public business.

If present and voting, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 66, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. LANGER and Mr. TAYLOR was rejected.

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution. I have changed the printed copy by leaving out section 4. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert the following:

That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

"ARTICLE—

"SECTION 1. The term of office of each President of the United States and of each Vice President of the United States elected after the date of this article takes effect shall be 6 years; and no person who shall have served as President or Vice President shall be eligible for election to the office of President or the office of Vice President.

"SEC. 2. No person shall be eligible for election or appointment to the office of Senator or Representative in Congress for any term which, if served by such person, would cause the aggregate service of such person as a Member of either or both the Senate and the House of Representatives to exceed 6 years.

"SEC. 3. Nothing contained in section 1 or section 2 of this article shall be construed to prevent any person who may hold the office of President, Vice President, Senator, or Representative in Congress during the term within which this article is ratified from holding such office for the remainder of such term.

"SEC. 4. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 7 years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress."

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, my amendment, offered as a substitute, merely differs from the pending joint resolution by including all the elected Federal officials in the limitation of tenure of office, and limiting the tenure to 6 years.

It is my considered opinion that the subject before the Senate at the present time is one of the most important problems ever presented to this body. It is a fundamental problem. It is not just a passing controversy. It is of such a fundamental nature that our forefathers who wrote our Constitution, with all their keen insight into the future, saw it clearly as a fundamental problem, but with all their wisdom deemed it wise to postpone decision until years of experience as a democratic republic would shed more light on the subject.

We cannot, Mr. President, without abandoning our duty as Senators, brush by this fundamental problem with a lick and a promise. The time has arrived for us to act. The hour has struck for us to make the decision which the framers of our Constitution bequeathed to future generations, because they thought lack of time and experience disqualified them from making that all-important decision. To say that we do not possess the experience they lacked is to disavow the truth. We have the benefit of over 170 years' experience which they did not have.

I also believe we should confine our discussion to the subject of office tenure. Since the beginning of our Republic there has been no constitutional limitation on the length of time Federal elected officials could serve. We are now considering placing a limitation on the Presidency. Why should we apply a limitation on only one Federal office, Mr. President? Is it to be claimed or assumed or insinuated that the evil of long tenure in public office can exist only in one of the many Federal elective offices? If long tenure in public office is an evil which should be abolished, it certainly must be an evil that applies to all public offices in our Federal Government. My substitute resolution applies limited tenure to all elective Federal offices.

Mr. President, the principal difference between a monarchical form of government and a representative democracy is the length of tenure of the officials. Our forefathers recognized this difference, and to guard against long tenure they established terms of only 2 years for Congressmen, 4 years for the President and Vice President, and 6 years for Senators. Then they placed the authority to extend the tenure of all these offices in the hands of the voters of the Nation. They also placed in the hands of the voters of the Nation the power to limit the tenure by amending the Constitution. We are now considering this latter course.

In seeking to include all Federal elective offices instead of one office, that of the Presidency, surely I cannot be charged with inconsistency or selfishness. There are some people who believe that much harm has been done to our Nation by the two-term precedent of Presidency being broken. Others say they believe much benefit was gained by that incident. But, Mr. President, who can say that all the harm done or all the benefit gained was directly attributable to the President? In other words, could not some of this damage or some of the benefits have been charged to or credited to the long tenure of other duly elected Federal officials? Surely we have not reached the point were we to admit that the President alone is running this Nation. If we are going to change our elective system from unlimited tenure of office to a restricted tenure, under what system of reasoning can we apply the change to only one of the many elective offices, that is, the Presidency?

I also find that there is among our people a deep-rooted suspicion that some public officials have more interest in doing the things that will get themselves reelected, instead of doing the things that are best for the rank and file of our people. That opinion may be harsh and may be ill-founded, or it may be true in some cases. But, Mr. President, that suspicion could not exist regarding the President or Vice President, or any of the Senators, if we abolish reelections, as the adoption of my amendment would do.

So, Mr. President, while I do not entertain much hope of having my proposal adopted at this time, I do propose it in all sincerity, because I believe such an amendment to our Constitution would be highly beneficial to the people of the United States, and I am confident that they would gladly welcome the opportunity to ratify it if it were submitted to them. I hope it will be submitted.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in relation to this amendment, the committee, as I understand, did not have this proposal before it. It was introduced on March 7, while the House joint resolution was reported by the committee on February 21.

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. O'DANIEL. If the distinguished chairman of the committe will look up the record, he will find that my amendment was introduced early in the Eightieth Congress and was considered by the committee. Hearings were held. I was present, and presented my amendment to the committee, and it was considered.

Mr. WILEY. I stand corrected, then, Mr. President.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. WILEY. Very well; let us have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ELLENDER (when Mr. OVERTON'S name was called). I again announce that my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] was compelled to leave the Chamber because of illness. He authorized me to say that, if present and voting, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] is necessarily absent. If present and voting, he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] who is absent because of illness, is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] is absent by leave of the Senate; the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] is necessarily absent on state business; and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] is detained on public business.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] is unavoidably detained.

Each of the Senators whose absences I have announced would vote "nay" on this question if present.

The result was announced—yeas 1, nays 82, as follows:

So Mr. O'DANIEL'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will give me credit for one thing, and that is getting the Democrats and Republicans together on one subject. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any further amendments to be offered to the joint resolution? If not, the question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I desire to speak to the joint resolution, but not in favor of it, and not against it. In this proceeding I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on different phases of the subject. I was particularly interested in the address delivered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] because he covered a number of different phases, which, it seemed to me, should be covered, and should be considered. For that reason, in the last session of the Congress, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] and I submitted a concurrent resolution providing for the appointment of a joint committee to study and report on all phases of the question. The concurrent resolution was reported favorably by the committee to which it was referred. It was acted on favorably by the Senate itself, and went to the House of Representatives, where it was referred to a committee, but was not reported from the committee.

The first day of the present session of Congress the Senator from New Jersey and I submitted a concurrent resolution, not exactly in the same form as the one submitted in the previous session, but in the main in the same form in which it passed the Senate at the last session. I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to its importance since it suggests many questions which are not generally considered in this connection, but which we believe should be so studied.

The resolution provides that the joint congressional committee shall make a report as to these matters with the purpose of making the law certain as to the Presidential election and succession. These matters shall include, but shall not be confined, to the following—and I suggest, Mr. President, that Senators think over the desirability of making certain the solution of these questions which may occur, and which sometimes have occurred:

1. Whether or not the President and Vice President should be elected by the Electoral College, as at present, and if so whether or not the members should be legally bound to vote in accordance with their instructions.

There is no provision in the law as to that.

2. Whether or not provision should be made for the case where before the election of Presidential electors, or after such time but before the election of President and Vice President, a candidate for the Presidency or for the Vice Presidency dies, declines to run, or is found ineligible to take office if elected.

3. Whether or not provision should be made for the case of the death of any of the individuals from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

4. Whether or not provision should be made for the case where, after election, the President-elect, or Vice President-elect, or both, die, decline to serve, or fail to qualify.

5. How it shall be determined whether the President, or individual acting as President, is unable to execute the powers and duties of the office, and how the duration of such inability shall be determined.

That in our time has happened twice, and there is no solution of the question available in the law.

6. Whether or not provision should be made for an individual to execute the office of President in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President, including provision for selecting an individual to execute such office in cases where by reason of removal, death, resignation, or inability there is no individual upon whom the powers and duties of such office would otherwise automatically devolve.

7. Whether there are, or should be, any differences between the status, powers, duties, and privileges of an elected President and any other individual executing the office of President.

8. Whether or not there should be any limitation on the number of terms a person may serve as President.

At this session there have been approximately 21 bills and resolutions introduced relating to some of these subjects, most of them relating to one of them. It seems to me inadvisable that they should be considered separately. They are all interwoven. Under the wonderful reorganization which we are experiencing, some of the bills and resolutions have been referred to some committees, and others of them to other committees. The measure we have before us came from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Since the middle of last week, the Committee on Rules and Administration has been holding hearings on other measures which have been introduced on some of these subjects, including the one to which I now refer, Senate concurrent resolution 1. Within a short time that committee will probably reach conclusions as to all the matters which have been referred to it. It seems to me that the Senate ought to have the benefit of the report which that committee may make on the measures which have been referred to it, especially on the bill providing for the appointment of a joint committee of the Senate and House to consider all these subjects and make a report.

We do not wish to have a succession of constitutional amendments proposed for the same session of the Congress. The various States do not wish to have a succession of votes on various constitutional questions submitted to them. These questions have been under consideration since 1792, and the arguments for and against various schools of thought have gone back and forth. Solutions to some of these questions have been found in part. Solutions to all of them ought to be found. We ought to be certain, at least, what the law is, in case these emergencies arise—and they will be emergencies when they do arise. It is more important to have the law certain in these respects than it is to have the best law we could devise. I hope that in each instance the best law can be found, but it is more important that we have some solution, and make the law certain.

For that reason I am moving that this subject be postponed for 2 weeks, that is, until Wednesday, March 26. By that time I trust that the Committee on Rules and Administration, to which some of these questions have been referred, and which has been holding hearings on some of them, may be able to report. Then the Senate can decide whether it wishes to deal with each question separately, as is now proposed, or whether it wishes to deal with them by referring them all to a joint committee of the Senate and House for study and report. I think such study and report should be within a limited time, so that this session of the Congress may act upon the report when it is made.

I move that further consideration of the pending joint resolution be postponed until Wednesday, March 26.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, is the motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is debatable.

Mr. TAFT. I only wish to point out that we have considered this measure for 3 or 4 days. Senators have made up their minds, and I see no reason why we should not vote on the joint resolution tonight.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] that further consideration of the pending joint resolution be postponed until Wednesday, March 26. [Putting the question.]

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, as I have notified the majority leader, I wish to address myself for a few moments to the joint resolution. I suggested to the majority leader that inasmuch as we are to return for a night session anyway, I would naturally much prefer to make my remarks when we reconvene at 7 o'clock. I wish that might be possible.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the understanding has been that we would take a recess at approximately half past five and reassemble at 7 o'clock. If the Senator's remarks are to be brief, and would consume only 10 or 15 minutes, that would be one thing. But if the Senator warms to his subject, as he sometimes does, I am apprehensive that he may run beyond the suggested limitation of time. Is the Senator in a position to indicate how long he wishes to speak?

Mr. PEPPER. A Senator can never tell when he begins a speech in the Senate just how long it will last or how many interruptions there will be. I would not wish to violate my obligation to my friend, so I had better not make an estimate.

RECESS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in view of the uncertainty of the situation, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 7 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 7 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION

The Senate reassembled on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. PEPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request, that following the disposition of the pending joint resolution the portal-to-portal pay bill be made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LUCAS. Reserving the right to object, it has been rumored that if the portal-to-portal pay bill should be made the unfinished business, the Senate would then take up the nomination of David E. Lilienthal. Is there anything to that, or will we go through with the portal-to-portal bill once we start on it?

Mr. WILEY. I have no knowledge whatever of what the Senator from Illinois refers to. It seems to me that would be a matter for further disposition of the Senate in connection with the Executive Calendar. But I have had no consultation about it, nor has anyone spoken to me on that subject.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Was it the Senator's request that now, at this time, the unfinished business be laid aside and that the portal-to-portal pay bill be taken up?

Mr. WILEY. That following the disposition of the present pending business, the portal-to-portal pay bill be made the unfinished business.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, why should the Senator from Wisconsin follow the rather unusual procedure of asking unanimous consent that when the pending business shall be disposed of the so-called portal-to-portal pay bill shall be made the unfinished business? The usual practice is to proceed with a matter until it is disposed of. When the pending matter shall be disposed of, I take it the Senator from Wisconsin will have no difficulty in being recognized by the occupant of the chair to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill to which he has referred. I think it is much better to proceed in the usual way, to make a motion after the pending joint resolution shall have been disposed of.

Mr. LUCAS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the pending question is whether or not the Senate by a two-thirds vote shall agree to submit to the people of the United States for ratification, through their legislatures, the following proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

> No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of the President, or acted as President, for more than 2 years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Mr. President, that is the language proposed by the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and adopted by the Senate this afternoon. In express language it excepts from the operation of the proposal the present occupant of the White House, and it would also except the President of the United States at the time the amendment should become operative, should it be properly ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

Mr. President, I shall not, directly or indirectly, question or attack the motives of those who are either the sponsors or the supporters of the proposed amendment. But I cannot refrain from saying that in my opinion the effect of it, the way it will be construed by the people of our country and of the world, is that it is aimed directly at the Presidency and the record of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Why do I say that, Mr. President? The intended amendment to the Federal Constitution is of course a constitutional limitation upon the right and present power of the people of this country, in free elections, to elect one to be the highest magistrate in the land. I say that not only because the proposal emanates from a party other than the party of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. I dare say its principal supporters are in that party, as has been manifest on the floor. I say that, Mr. President, because in the 158 years of the duration of this Government under the Constitution of the United States with the present unlimited power of the people to elect a qualified man to the office of President as many times as they may see fit to elect him, no Congress has ever proposed to the country an amendment to the Constitution to deprive the people of that power, and no man has ever thrice, much less four times, been elected to the highest office within the gift of a sovereign people, save Franklin Delano Roosevelt. And, as Patrick Henry said, Mr. President:

> We have no light to guide our footsteps in the future except the lamp of the past.

Therefore those who are the sponsors and the supporters of the proposed amendment to the Constitution must find in the record of Franklin D. Roosevelt something which in their opinion justifies this radical deprivation of free franchise from the people of the United States to elect their own President.

Therefore I say, Mr. President, it seems to me it was intended to and it does submit to the Congress and to the country a referendum on the question of whether the people of the United States, under the circumstances then prevailing, were right in the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt to a third and to a fourth term as President of the United States.

Mr. President, what is proposed to be done by this resolution is in a time of relative calm and quietude to deprive the people of the power to choose their President in a moment of crisis. Let it be remembered that this Senate, this country, this world, are not the same Senate, the same country, the same world as they were in November 1940, nor the same as in November 1944. All we have to do, Mr. President, is to imagine the rivers of blood that have flowed since November 1940 and 1944 to give this country its present calm and quietude, to give democracy on earth the stability and the assurance which it enjoys today.

Mr. President, it is not easy for us as we sit here now in the calm which has been won by the blood and maimed bodies of so many who have given themselves for their country, to remember the crisis which faced the world in 1940, in November, when the people of the United States elected Franklin D. Roosevelt for the first time in their history to a third term. It is not always remembered how decisive was the judgment of the people in November 1940, and November 1944.

The able Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] placed figures in the RECORD in his distinguished remarks only a few days ago, and pointed out that in 1940 27,243,466 Americans voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt to continue in office for a third term. This constitutional amendment, if it had become a part of the Constitution prior to that date, would have thwarted the will of an overwhelming majority of the people of the United States. Twenty-two million three hundred and four thousand seven hundred and fifty-five Americans voted for Wendell Willkie. So a majority of approximately 5,000,000 votes were cast for Franklin D. Roosevelt for a third term over as worthy an opponent as ever sought the suffrage of the people of this country for their highest office.

Mr. Roosevelt received 449 electoral votes, while Mr. Willkie received only 82 electoral votes. Does that indicate, Mr. President, whether the judgment of the people of this country at that time, in the face of the crisis then confronting them, was decisive?

Mr. Roosevelt carried 38 out of the 48 States.

In 1944, the Senator from Alabama continued, the question was not a third term, but a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt. He received 25,603,152 votes and Mr. Dewey received 22,006,616 votes. In other words, Mr. Roosevelt received approximately 3,600,000 more votes than Mr. Dewey did when the question was whether Mr. Roosevelt should be elected for a fourth term. Mr. Roosevelt then received 432 electoral votes. Mr. Dewey received only 99 electoral votes. Mr. Roosevelt carried 36 States, or three-fourths of all the States of the Union when he was running for election for a fourth term. And incidentally, Mr. President, in both those elections President Franklin D. Roosevelt carried a sufficient number of States in the country to justify the ratification of a constitutional amendment—three-fourths of all the States. There was a referendum submitted to the people, not to the legislatures, as the present amendment contemplates. I suppose I am correct, that the previous action of the Senate that the ratification shall be by legislatures is contained in the amendment now before the Senate.

That was a referendum, Mr. President, by the people whose sons would have to make the sacrifice necessary to secure and to protect America. In my opinion, that was a democratic referendum, and the decision was authoritative beyond any possible cavil or question.

Now, Mr. President, let it be remembered that when the people of the United States cast the vote for Franklin D. Roosevelt in November of 1940 to be for the first time the breaker of the anti-third-term precedent, the clouds of war that would engulf America as well as Europe were already dangerously looming on the American horizon. Let it be remembered that as early as Dunkerque, in June of 1940, the President of the United States, while persistently working and earnestly praying for peace, realized that if America was to remain secure against totalitarian aggression America had to give assistance to the victims of Hitler's cruel assaults on the other side of the Atlantic.

If Senators will pardon a personal reference, I shall never forget the day when I went to see President Roosevelt about some matter, and as I sat down in the chair beside him he pulled open his desk drawer and took out several sheets of paper, which he handed to me. He said, "I thought you would be interested in that." I glanced at it, and it seemed to be a catalog of a great quantity of machine guns, a considerable amount of shells, of light arms, equipment, and weapons of war. As I looked upon it the President said, "I have just sent those to England. I pray they get there before it is too late." That was right after Dunkerque in 1940. He had, without authority of law, without even the technical right to make a disposition of American property, in order to save America and possibly to save American blood, sent a million, I believe, of light arms and a large quantity of ammunition to Great Britain at a time when Britain did not have 10,000 armed men on the British Isles to defend them against aggression if Hitler's assault had struck that tight little island. Yes, the American people knew that, Mr. President.

It was along about that time, and about 3 weeks before the Democratic convention in 1940, that I recall the President saying, "I want to go home. I want to go home." In that man's face there was not only physical and mental fatigue, but there was the anguish of a tremendous decision to be made in his own great head and heart. He was wrestling with the traditional decision of Washington, Jefferson, and other Americans. He wondered whether the emergency justified his asking the American people to permit him to be the instrument to break that almost sacred political tradition. I heard him say over the telephone to the Democratic convention in 1940, when the platform subcommittee had written into a resolution language which would prevent him from effectually defending America, or make him break his word if he did it, "I will not accept the nomination on those conditions. It would make me violate my obligation to the American people or forfeit my duty to defend and protect America."

The understanding hearts of the people of the country and the glowing pages of history will attest that no man struggled so much with that decision as did Franklin D. Roosevelt. He concluded, as did his party, which had never nominated anyone for a third term, and which had a record of fidelity to the principles of democracy which I dare say is not excelled by the record of any other political party in the country, that the emergency of the then circumstances demanded, for the sake of the safety and security of America, the continuation in the Presidency of the experience which no other living man besides Franklin D. Roosevelt possessed. The obligation of America to defend democracy on earth was greater than the peculiar tradition against a third term which may have been justified upon distinguishable facts, and which may have been fathered even by the Father of our Country.

Franklin D. Roosevelt dared to risk the denunciation of his fellow countrymen and history by failing in what his enemies would call a grasp for power, in order that he might give the best he had—and it was later his life—in the defense of America.

We do not always recall that it was on September 3, 1940, after President Roosevelt had been nominated by the Democratic convention in Chicago, that the destroyer deal, the transfer of 50 American destroyers to hard-pressed Britain, was consummated in exchange for a 99-year lease on strategic bases in the Western Atlantic. It is easily forgotten that the transfer of those 50 destroyers, courageously undertaken, as was the shipment of the 1,000,000 rifles and machine guns after Dunkerque, may have been the salvation of Britain, sorely pressed as she then was. It is easy to forget the battle of Britain as we sit here in the calm of the Senate, in the security of a country which has its security because so many have died that we might possess it. As we sit here this evening we do not remember what the British people were saying to us. We do not remember that one of the greatest war leaders of all times, Winston Churchill, was telling Franklin D. Roosevelt how long the British could stand up and preserve the bastion of our own later defense if such help as that were not given them by the Government of the United States.

We do not always remember that had we not had a courageous President at that time, who dared to risk impeachment, Britain might not have survived. President Roosevelt had no congressional authority either to transfer light arms to Britain after Dunkerque or the 50 destroyers; nor had he any congressional authority to start the wheels of our factories moving in America in order that a trickle, at least, of supplies might start toward Britain in the moment of her severest trial. The destroyers were transferred on September 3, 1940.

I wonder how many of us remember when the Selective Service Act was passed. That was September 16, 1940, on the eve of the November election. That was when political advisers, thinking less about America than about the election, were telling Franklin D. Roosevelt that it was political suicide to put a selective-service law into effect in the very shadow of the November election, when he was seeking an unprecedented third term. But again Franklin D. Roosevelt put America ahead of politics and ran the risk that Americans would not patriotically respond to the appeal of his courageous leadership. They responded, without any question of doubt.

Mr. President, that was all before the November election in 1940. Perhaps we have forgotten that the First War Powers Act was passed on December 18, 1940, before Roosevelt began to serve his third term, but after his election.

What happened after the election of President Roosevelt in November 1940? If I mention nothing else, Franklin D. Roosevelt was responsible in his third term for an event of transcendent importance. He was responsible for the passage of the lend-lease law. It was his genius which conceived the possibility of American all-out economic aid to the hard-pressed Allies. That event alone would entitle him to one of the greatest tributes in all history.

Why do I say that? The Lend-Lease Act passed by the Congress became effective on March 11, 1941. I think I can call two witnesses whose testimony is worthy of consideration. One of them is Winston Churchill, who said that lend-lease saved Britain. How much is Britain worth? How much was it worth to the Allied cause and to democracy and decency on earth that the British people be spared the noose of the conqueror around their necks and the cruel heel of the tyrant upon their bodies?

The other witness is Joseph Stalin, who said that lend-lease saved Russia. How many Americans did it save? How many sons of Senators came back alive from the war who would not otherwise have come back at all, or might have come back maimed had they returned, were it not for the millions of Russian men and women in uniform who laid down their lives to crush the common enemy, Adolf Hitler? The Soviet Ambassador in Washington told me that there were 7,000,000.

Does anyone think that a new man coming into the White House as a result of the November election of 1940 could have achieved the enactment by Congress, with the support of the country, of lend-lease legislation in March 1941?

Perhaps there are some who forget the bitterness of debate in the forum of public opinion in America and in the Congress before we were ever able to give our assent to that legislation. It is not so easy for some of us to forget it. If I may be permitted to say so, I had the honor to be hanged in effigy on an oak tree in front of the United States Capitol by a group of ladies who called themselves patriots, and purported to act with sincerity. I shall not question either their patriotism or their sincerity. The reason was that I, from a conscientious conviction that it was essential to the salvation of America and democracy on earth, had dared to offer the first lend-lease resolution that was offered in the Congress, in May 1940, and an amended resolution a few days later, and had done what I could in the Congress and in the country to persuade public opinion and the Congress to adopt that measure, which the President had courageously conceived and recommended.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Would the Senator care to express his opinion as to what an inexperienced man might have done in connection with the spending of more than $2,000,000,000 on the atomic bomb? I wonder what a new man might have done in that situation.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator for his question. In the dangerous and difficult path which President Roosevelt, for America, had to tread, what would any inexperienced man have done? Just as the President had the courage to conceive and to recommend lend-lease, regarded, I think, by nearly everyone as one of the most magnificent creations of statesmanship in all history, in the boldness of its concept and in the efficacy of its accomplishment; just as he had the courage and the genius to initiate and to press through to enactment the Lend-Lease Act, as the able Senator from Illinois has pointed out, he exhibited the same genius and the same courage in the initiation of research concerning the atomic bomb. From President Roosevelt came the original impulse for this inquiry, supported with the almost unlimited financial aid of the Government of the United States.

Then again, Mr. President, he made himself liable to the severest denunciation by his critics, had that enterprise failed, for daring to spend over $2,000,000,000 upon what his political opponents might later have called a quaint Roosevelt fantasy or dream.

Yes, Mr. President; lend-lease will stand as a testimonial for all time to Franklin D. Roosevelt. I venture to say, without fear of successful contradiction, that no other man elected in November 1940 to the Presidency, had he conceived or initiated such a proposal, would have been able to have it adopted, at least as speedily as did President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

As I have said, in my opinion, lend-lease made the difference between defeat and victory for the Allied cause. It made the difference as to whether the British people should be masters of their own destiny or whether Hitler and his cruel minions would lash their scorpions upon the backs of a once proud and free people. It made the difference as to whether or not the nations of Europe today would have at least their peculiar measure of freedom and sovereignty, or would be under the yoke of Hitler and his barbaric crew.

So I say, Mr. President, that if President Roosevelt had done nothing more than to initiate, recommend, and press to enactment lend-lease, he would deserve the eulogy and gratitude of the people of the United States and the world as long as we love liberty and hate tyranny on earth.

Let it also be remembered that the selective-service law which was enacted in September 1940, had to be extended if the American Army were not to melt away. Franklin D. Roosevelt did not know that Pearl Harbor lay just over the horizon. In 1941 he recommended the extension of selective service for another 18 months, I believe. What was the margin, Mr. President, by which that extension was passed in the Congress? There was a margin of one vote in the House of Representatives. Had the American Army melted away, as I recall the figures, its dissolution would have meant that three-fourths of the officers and two-thirds of the enlisted men in our then armed forces would have been disbanded and sent home, in the very shadow of Pearl Harbor.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. At the time when this program was voted on and there was a margin of one vote in favor of it in the House of Representatives, what party was in substantial control in the House?

Mr. PEPPER. The Democratic Party. Since the Senator has suggested that comparison, would he like to know the votes on all those critical measures cast by Members of the Republican Party, his party, and the Democratic Party? Would he like to have the country remember how the majority of his party voted on lend-lease? Would he like to have the country remember how a majority of his party voted on selective service? Would he like the country to remember how a majority of his party voted on the amendment of the Neutrality Act; on the fortification of Guam; on the building of more airplanes; on the addition of ships to the American Navy? I dare say that if the Senator would refresh his memory upon that record he would not make it a campaign document for the Republican Party in the next election.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am always interested in reviewing the promises of the leader of the Senator's party that American boys would never be sent to fight in a foreign war, and the reliance which the American people placed upon those assurances and promises in the hectic days which meant so much to the destiny of America.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is also apparently forgetting the Democratic platform which was the basis of the supposed promise of President Roosevelt to his party and to the American people. It stated that the Army and the Navy would not be sent out of the United States, except in case of attack. In the acceptance of the Democratic Party's nomination, in a radio message to the country at large as well as to the convention, President Roosevelt made that eminently clear to his party and to the American people. Does the Senator deny that we were attacked?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Exhaustive examination of verbatim reports of the Boston speech of President Roosevelt fails to reveal that the words "in case of attack" were included in the original draft of the speech at the time it was made.

Mr. PEPPER. I happened to be a member of the resolutions committee of the Democratic convention which wrote that platform. Other Senators who participated in the convention will recall the language contained in the platform. We recall that at noon of the day the platform was adopted by the resolutions committee the President told representatives of the platform committee that he would not accept the nomination unless those qualifying words "except in case of attack," or something similar to them, were included. I happened to be on the other end of the telephone, along with some others, and heard him say that. That was when he said, "I would have to break my promise or forfeit my duty to the American people." Even then he was putting America ahead of politics.

No, Mr. President; I should not suppose that our friends on the other side would want to rehash the issue of how they voted in those trying days, as to whether they helped Franklin D. Roosevelt or not. I am speaking of the majority and not all the members of the Republican Party; nor did all the members of the Democratic Party go along. But in every case, on every critical issue, such as selective service, lend-lease, the amendment of the Neutrality Act, and every other crucial vote leading up to Pearl Harbor, Mr. President, when Franklin Roosevelt was pleading and praying for the American Congress and the country to help him save America, a majority of the Republican Party held down the hand of President Roosevelt instead of holding it up—and that is history, Mr. President.

We often talk about the Soviet Union here, in this country or in Congress. I also remember that when the vote was had in the Senate on whether Russia should be permitted to be the beneficiary of lend-lease, nearly every Republican Senator on this floor voted "nay."

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. Did I correctly understand the Senator from Florida to say that a majority of the Republicans voted against lend-lease?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. And did I correctly understand the Senator from Florida to say that a majority of the Republicans——

Mr. PEPPER. I referred to a majority of the Republicans in the Senate.

Mr. BROOKS. I was here then, sir.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. The Senator from Florida said that a majority of the Republicans objected to having Russia receive lend-lease; did he not?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; I said that practically all the Republicans voted for the amendment which was offered, I believe, by the Senator from North Carolina—at least a majority of the Republicans, and I think there were only a very few of them who did not vote for that amendment to deny lend-lease to Russia. The record will speak for itself.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, that is where I came in. I came to the Senate about the time when the lend-lease arguments started. I objected to lend-lease. I objected to having Russia receive lend-lease aid. And now that we have spent $341,000,000,000 and now that we have glorified Russia—and I am one who objected to having Russia receive it——

Mr. PEPPER. I thought so.

Mr. BROOKS. Now we have got to fight Russia. There is nothing else before us at this hour than the appropriation of $400,000,000 to stop Russia in Greece or in Turkey. If the Republicans had prevailed then and had let the Germans eat up Russia, we would not be in the predicament we are in now. What the Senator from Florida has claimed to be true, I admit to be true so far as I am concerned, for I told the country then that they were lying to the American people. It was not lend-lease. It was giving away, and nothing has come back.

Now we start all over again, not in a big way, but in a little way. When the President of the United States spoke today about giving one-tenth of 1 percent of $340,000,000,000, I wonder whether he was talking about the $340,000,000,000 we spent before now or whether it is the $340,000,000,000 we are going to spend from now on to stop only one philosophy—the Russian communism about which the Senator who has the floor has spoken so eloquently.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Illinois say that the Senator from Florida has spoken eloquently about communism?

Mr. BROOKS. The Senator from Florida has decried every protest against Russia that has been offered on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. I am glad the Senator has seen fit in the interest of accuracy to change his remarks.

Mr. BROOKS. Whether in the interest of accuracy I have changed my remarks or not, I have answered the Senator's question.

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator from Illinois means to suggest or to infer that the Senator from Florida has ever said anything in commendation of communism, the Senator from Illinois is either grossly misinformed or intentionally in error.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Gladly.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the Senator from Florida, for the benefit of the Senate and the country, distinguish between Russia and communism?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; I shall gladly do so. It was Russia that saved more than a million American lives by killing Germans. That is the Russia I am talking about. It is the Russia that I do not want to go to war with America, that I am talking about when I discuss American foreign policy.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Gladly.

Mr. BROOKS. It was Americans who saved more than 10,000,000 Russian lives by going to their defense. It was not Russia that saved American lives, but it was Americans who saved Russian lives when people glorified Russia and told us the Russians were ready to accept freedom of religion, and called Russia a democracy.

Now I am wondering whether we are defending a democracy in Greece or whether we are reestablishing in Greece a king, another form of autocracy. I should like to have the Senator address himself to that point.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; in due course I shall be very glad to advert to that.

But let me go back to the point with respect to which the Senator from Illinois said, "That is where I came in." Where he came in was to help me affirm a statement I had made as to where the majority of his party had been in regard to lend-lease and extending lend-lease aid to Russia, when Russia was attacked by Hitler. More eloquently than anything I could have said, the Senator from Illinois has revealed what then was the attitude of his party and what still is the attitude of many members of his party.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I have never undertaken to speak for my party. I speak only for myself, as I do tonight. The main speech I then made in the Senate was against lend-lease, and I said then we were lying to the American people and it was leading us into war. And it did.

I am saying now that what the President requested today is not one-tenth of 1 percent of what we spent yesterday, but it is one-tenth of 1 percent of what we will spend tomorrow. God grant that some day we shall have someone in America, in the Presidency, who will stand up and tell the American people the truth, and will say to them, "This is the program I am leading you into, and this is the thing you are going to face," and then let the American people decide whether they want to take it or not.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the views of the Senator from Illinois are not being expressed for the first time, of course; for on the subject of lend-lease and the subject of aid to the Allies and the subject of helping Russia and possibly—although I do not recall—the attitude of the Senator in regard to the transfer of the 50 destroyers, and other matters of that sort, the Senator's attitude is no doubt well known to the public, as is the attitude of the Chicago Tribune, with which the Senator from Illinois has on occasion been found in accord. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I objected to the transfer of the destroyers because I said it was an act of war. I objected to every step we took which led in the direction of war. Now that it is over and now that we have spent, according to the President of the United States, $341,000,000,000 of America's wealth, and now that we have sent 350,000 of America's youth to their deaths, and now that we have a million wounded men, and now that we have a $269,000,000,000 debt, that is where I came in.

Now we are starting it all over again, except we are not sending 50 destroyers, but we are sending what we term today to be military personnel. That means army; it means tanks; it means war. Why not say it and let us decide whether we want to take it or not?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator from Illinois would be ready to go to war with Russia. He did not seem, however, so anxious that we should fight against Hitler, back there in the days when Hitler was threatening our country and our kind of a world. So, in order that the record may be correct, let me inquire whether the Senator from Illinois voted on the question of selective service, in 1940?

Mr. BROOKS. I was not here at that moment.

Mr. PEPPER. Was the Senator from Illinois a Member of the Senate at that time?

Mr. BROOKS. I came in November.

Mr. PEPPER. In November of 1940?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. PEPPER. Did the Senator from Illinois vote for the extension of selective service in 1941?

Mr. BROOKS. I think I did, sir, at that time.

Mr. PEPPER. Is the Senator confident?

Mr. BROOKS. I am not sure.

Mr. PEPPER. I see. But the Senator from Illinois does remember that he voted against lend lease, and he still believes it was a mistake; is that correct?

Mr. BROOKS. I say to the Senator from Florida that——

Mr. PEPPER. I just want to get the record straight.

Mr. BROOKS. The Senator from Florida will get the record straight from me, Mr. President.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask the Senator whether what I have said is correct.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, it is always a mistake to lie to the American people or to camouflage what one is trying to do to the American people.

Mr. PEPPER. That is why I am trying to get the record straight now.

Mr. BROOKS. All right; get it straight.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask whether the able Senator from Illinois voted against lend-lease.

Mr. BROOKS. I did; I spoke against it, and I voted against it.

Mr. PEPPER. Did the Senator vote for the amendment to deny lend-lease to Russia? I take it he did.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not think that the question of denying lend-lease to Russia was ever before the Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. Oh, yes.

Mr. BROOKS. Is the Senator sure?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes, and I would wager the Senator voted "aye" on the Reynolds amendment to deny Russia lend-lease.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the Senator send some of his clerks, of whom he has so many, to find the page of the RECORD where that is recorded?

Mr. PEPPER. I would not dare to compete with the chairman of the Committee on Rules in the number of clerks I have at my command.

Mr. BROOKS. But the Senator still has many clerks as he had in the past, and I should like to know the page of the RECORD.

Mr. PEPPER. I shall be very glad to get it, if I can, this evening, but I dare say——

Mr. BROOKS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator will allow me to finish—I dare say that if the Senator did vote the other way, it was only an oversight, in view of what he said here this evening. So that makes that clear.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. Notwithstanding how I voted on lend-lease, I say today now that we have stopped Hitler from taking over Europe, and Japan from taking over China and Asia, that there are as many concentration camps in the world tonight as there were when the Senator voted for all these things he is glad he voted for, and there is as much hate and there is as much oppression and there are as many persons in prison in the world as there were before we started. There must have been some way, when all of these things were accomplished, when we had the greatest air power in the world, the greatest naval power in the world, when all our people were tuned to production, to say to Russia, "These are the terms on which we will become and remain your ally," instead of bringing home to us the message that they subscribed to the Atlantic Charter, that they subscribed to the United Nations, that they subscribed to freedom of religion—all of which they did not subscribe to, and everything they do gives the lie to their subscription.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, one has but to hear the persuasive argument of the Senator from Illinois, one has but to remember the editorials and twisted news stories of the Chicago Tribune, with which, I say, the Senator from Illinois on occasion found himself in agreement, to appreciate how great was the victory of Franklin D. Roosevelt in securing the legislation with which he could help to defend America and democracy in the world from Hitler and his gang in those trying days, when the opinion of this country was so bitterly aroused.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. PEPPER. I should be very glad to have the Senator ask a question. I would rather not allow him to make a speech, although it is always interesting and perhaps informing.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, that we are talking about Hitler and Germany, and our willingness to meet them, I have just one suggestion to make to the Senator. There was another war called World War I, in which I met those Germans in the front line. I met them face to face. I shot them, and they shot me; and that is much different from merely talking about bravery on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I do not know what the able Senator from Illinois is trying to prove. I do not suppose anyone has questioned his bravery, or the fact that he had a creditable war record in World War I, and I do not suppose it is necessary to make to his colleagues a suggestion of his bravery for them to be informed about it. I think it is pretty generally known that the Senator had a good war record in World War I. It is surprising to me, having fought the Germans one time, he seemed so little disposed to keep them off the heads and necks of his fellow Americans a second time.

Mr. President, I am not aware of having made any eulogy to bravery here in the Senate. I have been talking about the part Franklin D. Roosevelt contributed in a time of national and world crisis toward saving America and democracy in the world. The question has been raised as to who helped Roosevelt, and who tried to thwart him in every herculean task he attempted to accomplish. However brave and however creditable the war record of the Senator from Illinois in World War I was, it is in sharp contrast, in my opinion, to his statesmanship in defense of America as World War II approached, through those crucial days, because I will say that the judgment of history——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Just a moment. The judgment of history, I dare say, will be far more decisive in the memory of men than anything the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Florida might say here this evening. But I am willing to put in the RECORD, for history, the war record in World War II, and the days preceding it, of Franklin D. Roosevelt alongside the record of the able Senator from Illinois, and let mankind judge of the wisdom of the two.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. May I say that written in blood, fire, and heroism is the sacrificial record of the Senator from Illinois, who displayed his defense of this country and his belief in Americanism on the field of battle, and in the face of the enemy who would have destroyed him, and not in forensics or speculation or talk.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, if the Senator thinks he has contributed anything, I am glad to have yielded part of my time for him to have done so.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. If he thinks he can contribute anything else so unessential and so irrelevant to it, I shall give him further time.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. I take it the question at issue is the valor of the Senator from Illinois. Is that what we are going to debate? I am glad to have the testimony of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PEPPER. I gladly yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The question at issue is not necessarily the valor of the Senator from Illinois, it is the question of the symbolism of American sacrifice in the test, when American ideals and American philosophy are being tried. I honor the Senator from Illinois, as I do other Members of this body on both sides of the aisle whom I can see around me, who have contributed equally, not of forensic ability, but of their own blood and courage in times past to defend the ideals in which they believed.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to repeat that what we were discussing was the wisdom of a proposed amendment to the Constitution, the initiative of which comes largely from the other side of the aisle. I was saying that Franklin D. Roosevelt gave America and the world leadership which, in my opinion, made the difference between victory and defeat for the allied cause.

I am saying, Mr. President, that the wisdom of the American people in the reelection of Franklin D. Roosevelt was vindicated in his accomplishments in his third and his fourth terms as President of the United States, and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

I am talking about public policy, Mr. President, and I have not intentionally brought up the question of any Senator's valor. But I dare say the Senator from Illinois does not have a monopoly on that virtue in this body. If I were to call the roll I think he would find himself in good and gallant company with colleagues of his who have not seen fit to rise and parade their own valorous accomplishments in World War I or World War II.

Mr. President, I am not talking about personalities, I am talking about public policy and principles, and it was the other side of the aisle that injected the question about what was the attitude of the Republican Party upon some of the decisive votes at the time.

It has been said here this evening that we may have to fight Russia. I do not know whether we will have to fight Russia or not. I know we have had to fight Germany twice in our own time. The Senator from Illinois has pointed out his own conspicuous contribution to our victory the first time. I am saying, Mr. President, that as between Germany and Russia, I know that Germany has tried to conquer the world twice, and made war upon us. I do not know what the Soviet Union will do; that is a different subject, about which a great deal can be said, concerning our relations with the Soviet Union, whether the fault perhaps may be distributed, and centered not altogether in one place; but I am saying, Mr. President, that had Hitler conquered the Soviet Union, and England and all Europe, America probably would not have had the atomic bomb to fight a war against Russia, if we ever have to fight one. I am saying that America would not be the strongest power on earth today, including Russia. I am saying that if Hitler had triumphed, he would have been master probably of the Eastern Hemisphere, and that in the whole of the Western Hemisphere there is not much over 250,000,000 people out of a world population of 2,000,000,000.

I am saying that if Hitler had won the war, Mr. President, we would not today have a Navy equal to all the other navies of the world, the real beginnings of which were begun by Franklin D. Roosevelt, some of which the party of the Senator from Illinois opposed here upon the Senate floor. I am saying that if Hitler had won the war we would not have the most powerful air force on earth today, including the Soviet Union, a part of the increase of which the Republican Party opposed in the Congress.

I am saying if we have to fight Russia we are incalculably stronger, Mr. President, today, by virtue of Hitler being crushed, with lend-lease, and with the strength we have acquired since those hectic days, than we would have been otherwise.

I am saying, Mr. President, that if Hitler had won the war and become the master of the Eastern Hemisphere, the battle would be raging this very night, and I do not know how many Senators on this floor might personally be involved in the battle. I know there are some who would be in uniform, who are now here, who are tonight sitting with us as colleagues, who might be engaged in battle in some far corner of the earth at this very minute; and I know that there are son after son, and perhaps daughter after daughter of Members of the Senate, who would be facing Hitler's cruel weapons probably in the Western Hemisphere, if the counsel of men like the Senator from Illinois and the Chicago Tribune had prevailed instead of the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I want to make one observation. I listened to the President's speech today. I think it is fair to say that the Congress of the United States probably ought to hear the evidence from the specialists in the different departments as to what will be done with the money which is requested, and so forth; but does not the Senator think it is a little premature to be talking about war with Russia until we know more about what the money is to be used for and more about the details of this program? I do not see why the Senator from Illinois should be talking about war with Russia at this particular time.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I do not have the newspapers here before me, but I believe one could read in the columns of the Chicago Tribune a vituperation against Great Britain, back in those days, almost as severe as their present denunciation of the Soviet Union.

I know, Mr. President, that Britain at that time was held up as one of the monsters of the world, and because some of us advocated that we should help Britain, in order that we might assist in the defense of America, we were not only called pro-British but un-American. We were accused of saying we would lay down American lives, spill American blood, to save the British Empire. Those were the arguments used at that time against the defense of America and democracy on the earth. The same old game of trying to becloud and confuse the issue.

Mr. President, I have spoken about lend-lease. Does the record of Franklin D. Roosevelt as the Commander in Chief of our armed forces stand out before history so that it should be repudiated by this Senate in proposing to the American people a constitutional amendment to make it forever impossible for the people to elect another Franklin D. Roosevelt to such a position of leadership and power? I do not think that would be the judgment of history, Mr. President. I do not think it is the judgment of America's generals, admirals, and air men who served under President Roosevelt without regard to party. I doubt that you could find a higher testimonial to President Roosevelt's leadership as Commander in Chief than you would get from General Marshall, General Eisenhower, Admiral Nimitz, Admiral Leahy, and Admiral Halsey, and all the rest of that galaxy of brilliant leaders who led America to the most glorious victory in arms the world has ever seen.

Mr. President, I am saying only this, that what is proposed here is to limit the right and the power of the American people in a moment of great crisis, when their country and their world tremble in the balance, to elect a man eligible and available whom they deem best fitted to lead them through the crucial time.

Is there anything more democratic than that?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. As the Constitution is now written, as George Washington said, so well quoted here by other Senators on the floor, the American people have the power to elect a President as many times as they choose to do.

George Washington, writing to Lafayette, as we all know, said:

> Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the service of any man who, in some great emergency, shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public need.

That is what George Washington said.

I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, the Senator a moment ago referred to some historical programs of procedure for the American Government. He said that if certain philosophies had been followed, certain things would have happened. He said at that time, as I recall, that Hitler was about either to extend or take over his dominion of the Eastern Hemisphere in Europe, or the eastern part of Europe. This is the question I should like to ask the Senator: The Senator was undoubtedly at the joint session today when the President of the United States addressed the Congress in a most solemn and thoughtful message. I am wondering if the Senator will not concede that the sum total of that message was that, whether as a result of or in consequence of the policies we have been following, communism is today taking over the entire eastern part of Europe and threatening to control all of that hemisphere. I am wondering, Mr. President, whether the Senator prefers the dominion of Europe by communism or whether he prefers the dominion of Hitler, or just what his position is.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, we have been talking about the question of whether or not the people of the United States should have the free and untrammeled power to elect a man who is their President, and whom they prefer, to either a second, a third, or a fourth term as President of the United States; and I have been citing the fact that the American people in a moment of emergency and crisis, as George Washington himself said, should have that power, and should not, by a United States Congress, either sitting in the calm of such a moment as this, or who may desire to strike a blow at the record of Franklin D. Roosevelt, to deprive them of the power to exercise their free prerogative in a moment of commanding crisis. That is the issue. I shall not be deviated from that issue by anything my Republican friends may say; but I will say that Franklin D. Roosevelt's record in bringing about good will between this country and Russia, in establishing harmony between this country and England and the other nations of the world, has not been excelled by any President in the Nation's history.

Now that the Senator from Iowa has asked a question, let me read a little testimonial to what Franklin D. Roosevelt accomplished in our foreign policy. These are not my words. They are the words of Mr. Sumner Welles, for many years Under Secretary of State of our country, whose distinguished service I think is not questioned by any appreciable number of Americans. I have the book in which the following words appeared originally entitled "Where Are We Heading?" written by Mr. Welles, but I shall read a selected summary beginning on page 75 of the February 1947 issue of Omnibook Magazine. These are Mr. Welles' words:

Let's look at the world as it appeared by midsummer of 1944.

I need not say that that was then in the fourth term of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The United States was then approaching the peak of its strength.

I commend those words to Senators who speak of our necessities of the future.

It had become more powerful than any other nation of the earth. The fate of Germany was already sealed. While we then believed that Japan would continue the struggle for a longer period than transpired, her approaching defeat was clearly foreshadowed.

It was evident that Great Britain would be utterly exhausted upon the conclusion of the war. The signs were already plain to all who cared to see them that the world order which must then be created would bring freedom to the colonial peoples, and that the liquidation of the British Empire was at hand. The British Commonwealth of Nations itself must undergo a profound transformation in the postwar period as a result of which the mother country's position would become far less dominant.

It was plain that only the Soviet Union could emerge from the war in a position of supremacy comparable to that of the United States. But while her potential strength was greater than ours, she clearly would require many years before her full strength could be exerted.

The United States had neither suffered the losses nor experienced the devastation undergone by the Soviet Union. We were already fully industrialized and our living standards were the highest in the world.

Mr. President, I interpolate to say that was at a time when we were not only maintaining our own armies and navies and air forces, but sustaining those of other countries of the world, and making an incalculable contribution to the world economy. We had then, under Franklin D. Roosevelt's leadership, not only the strongest fighting forces but the strongest domestic economy that America had ever seen.

We possessed by far the greatest navy and the largest and most modern air force. Some 8,000,000 of our men were under arms, and this total could be rapidly expanded if necessary. We possessed the greatest developed natural resources of any nation, and our achievements in industrial production had become a source of amazement to our allies and foes alike. Finally, although the world at large did not yet know it, the Government of the United States had within its possession the secrets of the source of atomic power, and the first weapons utilizing the force of atomic fission were already under manufacture.

The United States enjoyed an influence abroad and possessed an opportunity for leadership that no other major power had. The masses of the people, whether in Latin America, in the Far East, or in the occupied countries of Europe, regarded President Roosevelt as their champion. More than that, the United States, because of her past history, because of the beliefs of her people, and because of her democracy, was nowhere feared. She was known to possess no imperialistic ambitions; she was not suspected of desiring to extend her political or economic influence for purposes of domination, or for any other selfish ends.

As a result of the policies which President Roosevelt had carried out throughout the course of his administration, there existed in the New World a well integrated inter-American system which gave the United States, in its international relations, the potential support of an entire hemisphere.

The relations between the Chinese National Government and the United States were of the closest. So were relations between the United States and all the governments of western Europe.

The ties established by the President with the elected heads of the British government and of the governments of the British dominions were closer than they had ever previously been between the chief executives of the English-speaking countries. And the personal understanding between President Roosevelt and Marshal Stalin, blunt as the messages which they exchanged may occasionally have been, had dissipated to some extent the cold suspicions of this country which had so long controlled the thinking of the leaders of the Soviet Union. A cooperative relationship had been achieved that would have seemed altogether impossible even 2 years before.

When Franklin Roosevelt died an epoch ended.

Yes, Mr. President; those are the words of Mr. Sumner Welles. Could any man elected in November 1940 or November 1944 have made a greater record than that? That is the Franklin D. Roosevelt who not only was elected to a third term and a fourth term by the people of the United States, but would have been elected to a third or fourth term had he then been in such an office, by the people of the world. Had there been an election in Franklin D. Roosevelt's time, especially from November 1940 until his death, a free election, save in the enemy countries, of a President of the world, does any Senator doubt that Franklin D. Roosevelt would have been elected over any other man living on this earth? That was why, Mr. President, when the shocking news circled the globe that he had been smitten down under the labor and toil of his office, and his great spirit had at last passed across the last perilous river to the safety of the great beyond, there were not millions but hundreds of millions of moist eyes in mourning in every country on earth, perhaps even some in the enemy countries who better understood the essential future that they should have.

That was the President Roosevelt whose death caused Winston Churchill, as he walked down the aisle of a British church, to let tears unembarrassedly stream down his brave cheeks as he thought of the friend he had lost and the leader that mankind had no more.

That was the Roosevelt that made tens of thousands of Russians, according to the testimony of our diplomatic officials in Moscow, gather in front of the American legation and there with tears in their eyes and with husky voices to the person of our Ambassador paid their tribute to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

That was the man whose name Stalin whispered when he poured his lamentations into the ear of the American Ambassador to Russia.

That was the Franklin D. Roosevelt to whom in every country, little and large in the world, people poured out their homage.

There are some of us now in the Senate who were on the funeral train of the President which went to Hyde Park. All night long we saw the people lining the tracks along which that train wound in its mournful course to the final resting place of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and how the people poured out their hearts, not only at the loss of a President, but at the departure of a personal friend, Franklin D. Roosevelt. There never will be in our time a man who grips the hearts of mankind the way Franklin D. Roosevelt did. They not only honored him, Mr. President, they loved him.

In conclusion, I think our people are to be safely trusted with their own destiny. That is the spirit of democracy and its intent. We do not need to protect the American people with a prohibition against a President whom they do not wish to elect; and if they wanted to elect him, have we the right to deny them the power?

Someone may say, "This is a democratic proposal. We are merely giving the people the power to pass on whether they war a constitutional prohibition or not." Are we, Mr. President? What did the Senate do yesterday, except to deny to the people an opportunity to vote personally or through a representative directly on that question? We defeated by an overwhelming vote an amendment offered by the able Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] which would have made the ratification of the proposed amendment subject to the action of conventions in three-fourths of the States, particularly elected for the purpose of passing on this constitutional amendment.

What is the present situation? In connection with the proposed amendment the people are not to vote. The legislatures of three-fourths of the States alone, by ratifying it, would place it in the Constitution.

We know that the election of members of legislatures, even when beyond question, is not upon a single issue, but upon many issues. A county or district may vote for a representative or State senator because he is an advocate of good roads, because he is in favor of keeping cattle off the highways, because he will lower taxes, because he will protect monopoly or dissipate it, because he is friendly to the poor or the companion of the rich. We are too experienced in public life not to know that constituencies vote for senators and representatives in State legislatures upon innumerable issues. We are not submitting this question of the amendment of the Constitution to the people; we have denied them the right to make it the sole issue in the election of delegates to a convention. We say that the legislatures of the States are to be the bodies which will have the right to prohibit the people from the election of a President whom they may wish to elect for a second, third, or fourth term. Is that more democracy than we now enjoy?

The able Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCGRATH] a former Solicitor General of the United States, pointed out here this afternoon in debate that every previous amendment to the Federal Constitution has enlarged the democracy of the people and not diminished it. Yet would we enlarge the right of the people by this proposal? No; we would reverse the tradition of more than 20 constitutional amendments which have steadily opened the doors of democracy to the people in ever-widening reach. We would say, "We the Congress, and we the Legislature, at best only your indirect representatives upon this issue, will deny to you the power—even of all of you—to elect a President of the United States whom you may happen to choose, because he happens already to have served in that exalted office."

This afternoon the able Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL] with more logic than he was given credit for—because his proposal received only his own vote—offered an amendment which would apply the same principle to all elective Federal officials. As I say, his proposal received only one vote.

Do Senators who have been Members of this body for more than one term wish to say that more than one term is too many? Are any Senators resigning because they think they are doing the public an injury by serving too long? Does any Senator serving his first term repudiate the right of the people to reelect him if they choose to do so? How inconsistent we are. But, of course, when we talk about electing Senators and Representatives, we are talking about ourselves.

I am reminded of the Irishman who was advocating socialism. He was persuaded that socialism was a good policy. It looked fair and idealistic. In his warm Irish heart he said, "That is a good policy. I am for it." One day he was making a speech, and was making a great impression on his audience. He said, "My friends, you do not realize what a good principle this is. If I had a thousand acres of land, do you think I would be so selfish as not to be willing to give half of it to my fellowmen? If I had a thousand dollars in the bank, do you think I would be so selfish as not to be willing to give half of it to my fellowmen? If I had two shoats, do you think I would be so selfish—no; I have two shoats." [Laughter.]

It is all right we say to limit the term of President, although, I dare say Senators are not without aspirations. I dare say that there are those in this body who would be willing to allow themselves to become victims of the ordeal of public service in the White House. I think Senators recall the story which "Czar" Reed is supposed to have told. It has been mentioned here previously. He was speaker of the House, and he liked to prod the Senate. He said one night he dreamed that the Congress had amended the Constitution and provided a new method of electing a President. The new method was that the President should be elected by a secret ballot of Senators. The momentous day arrived when the proposal was to be tried out for the first time. The galleries were naturally filled. The representatives of the press stood by intently to see what would be the result of the first trial of the new method of electing a President. Finally the golden urns were passed down the aisles and Senators deposited their secret ballots in the receptacles, which were passed up to the Presiding Officer to be canvassed. While everyone listened with bated breath, the result was announced, and it was discovered that every Senator had received one vote. [Laughter.]

There are Senators who may aspire to one term in the White House. If they are on the other side of the aisle, they are too good students of history not to recall that since Ulysses S. Grant no Republican President has been elected to serve two terms and has served them. So the Republicans have nothing to lose by this amendment. What they are trying to do is to keep the people from continuing to elect Democrats to more than one term. History is replete with examples of the people electing Democrats to two terms, and of Democrats serving two terms in the White House. One of our men was elected to a fourth term, by one of the greatest majorities ever given a President by the American people.

So, Mr. President, this proposal is not in the interest of democracy. No Senator can soothe his conscience by saying, "I feel that we should give the people an opportunity to vote on a constitutional amendment." What is proposed is to permit the publishers of newspapers who hated Roosevelt, propagandists, and people with money who would like to keep America from ever having another Roosevelt to influence enough legislatures to keep the people from having the power, even though the people wish to do so, to elect the man of their choice to the Presidency of the United States, in the face of the record of our founding fathers.

I shall not repeat what has been said here so many times. The other day the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], in a very impressive speech, quoted George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and many distinguished leaders of our country. He quoted Jefferson as saying that in case the country were threatened with a monarchy he would allow himself to become a candidate for a third time. He quoted Alexander Hamilton, a gentleman who I understand is quoted with considerable approbation by the party on the other side of the aisle.

The Senator from Alabama also quoted many other distinguished statesmen, including the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, who was also a distinguished historian, and the great Senator Borah, who not so long ago thrilled the Senate with his magnificent voice and his great head and heart. The Senator from Alabama quoted innumerable others, many of them belonging to the party of our friends on the other side of the aisle—all opposing such amendment as this and favoring the right of the people to elect a President as many times as they choose to elect him.

So, Mr. President, let no Senator think that he is compelled in the interest of democracy to give a legislature the power to deny the people the right to elect the President they want to elect. That is not democracy, Mr. President. Every American, Democratic and Republican alike, every voter, might desire in a moment of crisis to continue another President in office in some future period of ordeal as we continued President Roosevelt. Yet, if this amendment were a part of the Constitution, every voting American could not do so. Is that democracy?

I think we can trust the people, Mr. President. How many times in 158 years has there been an exception to what is called the Washington tradition. Just once. Have we ever been faced with a greater crisis than that which faced us in 1940? Does anyone think or contend that President Roosevelt would have offered himself, or that the American people would have elected him for either a third or a fourth term had it not been for the great international crisis that was confronting this country?

Mr. President, it has been said that the best way to defeat every dangerous ideology is to have a vital democracy. What could be more vital in a democracy than the power of the people to elect their own President?

I shall conclude by reading something which I deem not inappropriate. These words were uttered in hushed sorrow at the grave of Franklin D. Roosevelt by the minister of his church at the time of his funeral at Hyde Park:

Now the laborer's task is o'er;
Now the battle day is past;
Now upon the farther shore
Lands the voyager at last.
Father, in Thy gracious keeping
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

There the tears of earth are dried;
There its hidden things are clear;
There the work of life is tried
By a juster Judge than here.
Father, in Thy Gracious keeping
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

There the penitents, that turn
To the cross their dying eyes,
All the love of Jesus learn
At His feet in Paradise.
Father, in Thy gracious keeping
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

There no more the powers of hell
Can prevail to mar their peace;
Christ the Lord shall guard them well,
He who died for their release.
Father, in Thy gracious keeping
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

Earth to earth, and dust to dust,
Calmly now the words we say,
Left behind, we wait in trust
For the resurrection day.
Father, in Thy gracious keeping
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

Mr. President, let us leave the memory and the record, of Franklin D. Roosevelt sleeping in security in the hearts of the people of the world. Let us leave the protection the people now have in their Constitution sleeping and secure in that immortal document.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, when the Senate recessed for supper—at least we call it supper in my section of the country—I had supposed that it would be able to dispose of this matter in a few moments of debate. The discussion has, however, continued for an hour and three-quarters, and it is manifest that we cannot dispose of the joint resolution this evening. I therefore move, Mr. President, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Herman B. Baruch, of New York, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Netherlands, which nomination had been previously passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed. Without objection, the President will be immediately notified.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY—NOMINATION REPORTED ADVERSELY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gordon R. Clapp to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, which had been adversely reported from the Senate section of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I ask that the nomination be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Eugene R. Black to be United States Executive Director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Mr. LANGER. I ask that the nomination be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph K. Carson, Jr., to be a member of the United States Maritime Commission.

Mr. LANGER. I ask that the nomination be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Carroll L. Wilson to be General Manager within the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I suggest that the question of the confirmation of the nomination of the General Manager, the Chairman, and members of the Atomic Energy Commission be considered, at least for the purpose of discussion, as a whole, rather than to take up the appointment of the General Manager prior to taking up the appointment of members of the Commission. I have no objection to individual consideration of these nominations, but I request the Senate not to take up the nomination of the General Manager and leave until a later period consideration of the nominations of members of the Commission.

I ask unanimous consent that instead of the presentation of the nomination of the General Manager at this time as an isolated matter permission be granted to call up the nominations of the entire Commission and of the General Manager, and later divide the question, if the Senate wishes, for individual consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Senator intend to proceed with the consideration of the matter tonight, at this late hour?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. My intention at this time is to present my views on the subject, and then it will be the province of the Senate to decide whether to continue the discussion——

Mr. McKELLAR. At this late hour I think it ought to go over. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nominations do not go over as a matter of right. It is for the Senate to decide whether it desires to proceed with the nominations.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination of Mr. Wilson?

Mr. McKELLAR. I object.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the leadership on the majority side of the aisle to proceed to a conclusion on these nominations tomorrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is scarcely a parliamentary inquiry with which the Chair would wish to cope.

Mr. McMAHON. I will reframe it as an inquiry addressed to the majority leader.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it is the intention that there shall be no session of the Senate on Thursday. If these matters are not disposed of at this time they will go over to a later day, presumably Friday. I do not wish to interfere at all with the desires of the Senator from Iowa with respect to these nominations. The appointment of Mr. Wilson and the appointment of the three members of the Atomic Energy Commission are more or less related. It seems certain that there will be discussion, perhaps long discussion, certainly on the Lilienthal nomination, and possibly on the others. Under the circumstances it would seem to me wise that they should all go over for the time being. I make that request if it be agreeable to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has the floor. He has yielded to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I should like to address a question to the able majority leader, as to whether it is the intention, when these nominations for the Atomic Energy Commission are called up, to start the Senate operating on a 5-day schedule, so that the nominations may be taken up and proceeded with in that way, rather than on the present 3-day schedule. If that is not done, it seems to me that the debate which the Senate obviously will be faced with then may carry on for a period of 2 or 3 weeks. The Atomic Energy Commission is so vital to the country that it seems to me that when we start to consider the nominations to it we should carry the matter through to completion.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me, to permit me to make a reply to the statement of the Senator from California?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. So far as I am concerned, I wish to act in accord with the desires of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], who had so large a part in the conduct of the long hearings held in the committee on the nominations of members of the Atomic Energy Commission. So I am agreeable to anything the Senator from Iowa wishes to suggest in respect to the matter.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Objection was made, I believe, by the Senator from Tennessee to consideration of the nomination at this time. It is my understanding that the Senate has now gone into executive session and that the matter presently reached on the calendar is the nomination of Carroll L. Wilson, of Massachusetts, to be General Manager within the Atomic Energy Commission, and I understand the question now before the Senate is whether that nomination shall be confirmed. My question is whether an objection by one Member of the Senate can cause that nomination to go over, or whether that can be done only by a majority vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the normal procedure of the Senate, one objection has, in the ordinary course of events, been accepted as a reason for postponement. If there is objection to that procedure, under the rules the adoption of a motion is required to postpone consideration, because when a nomination is reached on the executive calendar, the question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination? That is the pending question in respect to the nomination of Carroll L. Wilson.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Then, Mr. President, I take the position, and shall insist on it, that the Chair should not concede or abide by any perfunctory objection and request for the continuation of this matter. If the Senate cares by majority vote to put the matter over, I shall insist that such action be taken under the rule, after a motion is made and the question decided by majority vote of the Senate.

So far as I am concerned, I believe that the matter of the confirmation or refusal of confirmation of the nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission, in the case of both the members and the General Manager of the Commission, is of the utmost importance to the United States and to the world, and I think in our own interest we do not dare delay taking action on it. I shall try not to be offensive about the insistence, if there is good reason for it, to have the matter go over, but certainly I should like to proceed with it.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me, to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield for a question.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], the majority leader?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. I ask whether it is the view of the majority that we should consider the nominations now pending, instead of continuing with consideration of House Joint Resolution 27? In other words, why has House Joint Resolution 27 been sidetracked? Why cannot we complete our work on the joint resolution, which has been debated on the floor of the Senate for the past 3 or 4 days?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, we do not seem to be getting very far with it; we have had sort of a two-ring circus on the floor of the Senate for the last hour and a half or 2 hours, so I felt we might proceed with something else, and have somewhat of a cooling-off period with respect to the joint resolution.

Mr. ELLENDER. I had understood that the speech of the Senator from Florida was the only speech to be made tonight, and that thereafter we would immediately vote on House Joint Resolution 27. Why not vote on that issue at this time?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I suggest if the Senator wishes to have a suggestion from me, that we now confine ourselves to these nominations.

Mr. ELLENDER. I was trying to get an answer from the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. WHITE. I take it that the Senate is in executive session, and it is the appropriate time and place for the consideration of these nominations.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield for a question.

Mr. LUCAS. I regret very much that, all of a sudden, House Joint Resolution 27 was laid aside because it seemed that we were about to vote on it. Practically every Senator on our side had that impression, and I thought we should get the joint resolution out of the way.

If we now take up the matter of confirmation of the nominations of members of the Atomic Energy Commission, I agree with the Senator from Iowa that we should begin with it and stay with it until we get through with it because there can be no doubt about the importance of having the nominations of members of that Commission confirmed or not confirmed at the earliest possible moment. The safety of the country and of the world is involved in that matter. Since I am acting temporarily in the place of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], I shall do everything I can to hasten action on it.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield for a question.

Mr. TAFT. I understand we are now considering the nomination of Carroll L. Wilson. Would it not be better to pass over that nomination and take up the nomination of David E. Lilienthal, without endeavoring to obtain unanimous consent to have all the nominations considered at the same time?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. In the interest of having sufficient attention given to the subject, I suggest that we do not stand on ceremony and do not take up one nomination at a time, as the name of one particular nominee may happen to be called or may happen to appear on the calendar but that we lump all of them together and discuss the entire question, which inevitably will involve a discussion of the entire Commission, with the possible exception that some special and, in some way, detailed attention may be paid to Mr. Lilienthal as we go along But I think all the nominations are so integrated and tied together that in the interest of efficiency we should discuss all of them together.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I think a unanimous-consent agreement of some sort would be required, if the Senator wishes to have that done, because under the normal rules only one nomination can be considered at a time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Iowa that there is no Senate rule which confines discussion to any one name during the call of the calendar.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I realize that. But the orderly procedure is the consideration of one nomination and the voting on that nomination and the disposal of it. I made what I thought was a practical suggestion; namely, that the entire list of nominations be considered together—unless the Senate orders individual consideration and discussion for each nomination, which course will be perfectly satisfactory to me, if that is the will of the Senate. However, I thought it would be better to begin with the Commission as a whole, rather than solely the nomination of the General Manager of the Commission. After all, he is a subordinate of the Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to having all the nominations considered together. That will be satisfactory. That is practically what we did before the committee.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Let me say that I do not propose to have the Senate vote on all of them together.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That will depend on what the Senate wishes to do regarding the matter of division of the nominations when it comes to voting on them.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator's suggestion is entirely satisfactory to me. However, it seems to me that 9 o'clock at night is not the proper hour at which to begin consideration of this matter. If the Senator will let it go over until tomorrow or the next day, depending on which day we adjourn or recess to, I think that will be preferable. I certainly have no desire to delay the matter in any way, but it should be fully argued and debated on the floor of the Senate, and thereafter decided.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana for a question.

Mr. ELLENDER. I should like to know whether the Senator from Iowa will insist that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nominations, and continue to consider them until it finally votes on them, or whether he will consent to consideration of other matters which may come before the Senate, particularly the joint resolution which has been the subject of debate for the last 3 or 4 days.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I may say to the Senator from Louisiana that this morning, in full anticipation on my part that before the session of this evening we would reach a vote on the then unfinished business, and having canvassed the situation somewhat with Senators on both sides of the aisle, I had reached the conclusion, as I suggested to the Senate, that this evening I would attempt to have the Senate begin consideration of the nominations for members of the Atomic Energy Commission, including the nomination of the General Manager of the Commission. I feel that not only must I do that, but I should do it.

I may say further to the Senator from Louisiana that, regardless of the attitude as to the individual members of the Commission, I think every member of the committee is tremendously impressed with the vital necessity of going forward with a consistent and reliable policy on atomic energy. Even to the point perhaps of being offensive to the convenience of some of the Members of the Senate, the committee, and, certainly, I, so far as my own personal opinion is concerned, feel justified in insisting that we use every possible means of speed consistent with a full discussion of this matter, which I have no desire to curtail, in order to go forward with the business and establish the policy we desire.

I may say specifically, in answer to the Senator's question as to whether or not I would defer, that I desire to have this matter established as the pending business before the Senate so that we can go forward with it. If I could have any reasonable assurance that, tomorrow, say, consideration of the present unfinished business would be of short duration, I should have no objection to temporarily leaving the matter of the executive business and disposing of the pending joint resolution, but I should have to insist, as strongly as I could, on returning immediately to the question of the nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission, so that it can be settled. I say now that it cannot be settled too soon for the good of our country, and that is the object I have in mind.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. My question was prompted merely by my understanding that the Senate would proceed this evening to rid itself of House Joint Resolution 27, and then proceed with the portal-to-portal pay bill, which I understand from what the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has said will be the next measure considered.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I believe I would change the Senator's phraseology, and instead of saying "rid itself," I would say "credit itself" with the passage of the measure.

Mr. ELLENDER. It is an issue which has been pending before the Senate for 3 or 4 weeks, and I am wondering if it would not be more important to conclude consideration of the pending measure, which can be voted upon within the next 10 minutes, and then proceed with the portal-to-portal pay bill, which we may be able to take a vote on by tomorrow or Friday, and thereafter proceed with the Atomic Energy Commission nominations.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, much as I am in favor of establishing the constitutional determination of the question of Presidential terms, if it is a question of delaying that question, which has now been undecided for some 160 years, without any final decision, or delaying for 3 or 4 weeks a reliable determination as to atomic energy, and its control and progress, I should certainly be in favor of delaying a decision on the election measure. I think the issue before us is that important.

Mr. ELLENDER. I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that if the occasion presented itself, he would not seriously object to having a vote on House Joint Resolution 27. Why not do it now? Let us get through with it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I do not think we can get through with it now.

Mr. ELLENDER. We can in less than 5 minutes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The point is, I have no assurance that if we delay and postpone the consideration of the nominations tonight we will be able to get them up with convenience and speed next Friday. I understand that the plan is not to hold a session on Thursday. May I ask the majority leader whether that is correct? I yield for an answer to the question.

Mr. WHITE. What was the question?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I said that it was my understanding that it is not the plan to hold a session tomorrow, Thursday.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator is definitely correct about that. We have had an understanding for several weeks that there would not be sessions of the Senate on Tuesday, on Thursday, or on Saturday, and I expect that most of the committees have already made commitments with respect to their work tomorrow. I know the committees with which I am connected have definite programs scheduled for tomorrow, having entered into arrangements in reliance on the general understanding we had that sessions of the Senate were to be held on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and that Tuesdays and Thursdays were to be devoted to committee work. I think that general understanding should be respected at this time, and that we should not set aside a general understanding until there is some opportunity to notify committees, the chairmen of committees, and the staffs, that the committees will not function as they have heretofore done on Tuesdays and Thursdays. I think it would be unfair to the committee membership, unfair to the chairmen of the committees, unfair to the whole secretariat of each of the committees of the Senate. I should not wish to consent to abandoning the reservation of Thursdays for committee meetings.

Mr. WILEY and Mr. ELLENDER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin for a question.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on one occasion in the British Parliament one of the young members said to Disraeli, "I wonder if I could talk." Disraeli replied, "No"; and the young man asked, "Why?" Disraeli replied, "Because it is better for your constituents to wonder why you did not speak than to wonder why you did." [Laughter.]

With that brief word, I am wondering what has become of the portal-to-portal pay measure, and why we Republicans have become uncertain about what I thought was the procedure to be followed, which I believed had been well arranged and understood. I frankly commented to my Democratic brethren that I knew nothing about an understanding concerning the Lilienthal nomination. As I understand, on the Lilienthal matter hearings have been held for 3 or 4 weeks, and it is expected that the rest of us who are not members of the committee shall be able immediately to digest the testimony that has been taken, and to understand the facts.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we should carry on as I understood the Policy Committee had arranged; to wit, dispose of the pending business, House Joint Resolution 27; after that proceed with portal-to-portal pay bill, and after that consider the Lilienthal nomination. That is what I understood.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. WILEY. Am I correct in my understanding?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Maine for the purpose of asking a question of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want to ask a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I hope I shall not lose the floor, in view of that statement.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Wisconsin has stated the understanding precisely as I understood it.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WHITE. That we would conclude the pending legislation as speedily as we could, consistent with giving it proper consideration; that we would then make the portal-to-portal pay bill the unfinished business of the Senate, and then at some early date proceed with the consideration of the Lilienthal nomination. That is the sum of my understanding about the agreement, and I think it conforms with the Senator's understanding.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield for a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington is recognized to propound his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MAGNUSON. May I inquire of the Chair whether or not, being in executive session, other nominations on the Executive Calendar, not members of the Atomic Energy Commission, could be considered at any time while the Lilienthal and the other nominations to the Atomic Energy Commission were under consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent.

Mr. MAGNUSON. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question, then?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. There are other nominations on the Executive Calendar which I think should not be held up for the length of time which it would take to debate the question of confirming the members of the Atomic Energy Commission.

If they should be held up, I think it would be a very serious matter, certainly in two instances that I know of. The reports are unanimous, one from the Judiciary Committee and the other from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. When the nomination of Joseph K. Carson was called a Senator on the other side said, "Over"; but I am sure that in about 2 minutes there would be a change of mind. The other is the nomination of A. Devitt Vanech, of Connecticut, to be an Assistant Attorney General. He is in charge of very important cases in the department. His nomination must be confirmed before he can act, and it is important that it be done immediately. In fact, the committee hurried consideration of the nomination especially, because in his case I think delay would be a serious blow at the work of the Department of Justice.

Joseph Carson has been nominated to be a member of the United States Maritime Commission to fill a vacancy which has existed for a long time. There are serious maritime problems which are now at the front door of the Commission. So I hope we can obtain unanimous consent to consider these two nominations without jeopardizing the position of the Senator from Iowa or the confirmation of the members of the Atomic Energy Commission. If the Senator would yield for that, I should appreciate it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I cannot yield for that purpose. If the Senator from Washington thinks there are difficulties in the United States Maritime Commission and the Attorney General's office, I may say to him that they are as nothing compared to the difficulties of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Mr. MAGNUSON. It would not prejudice the Senator's position.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana for a question.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I was trying to elicit from the distinguished Senator from Iowa information as to the time when the Senate will have a chance to vote on House Joint Resolution 27.

As in legislative session, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to a vote on House Joint Resolution 27.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I decline to yield for that purpose. I yielded to the Senator for the purpose of his asking a question, not for the purpose of asking unanimous consent.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question. With reference to the nominations for members of the Atomic Energy Commission, whose names appear on the Executive Calendar, is it important that their confirmation be hurried along for the purpose of enabling them to function as members of the Commission, or are they actually now functioning?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The members of the Commission and the General Manager are now actually functioning, and under all the authority of the Commission, by Executive order of the President. That is not exactly the question at issue. There is a certain degree of uncertainty and doubt in the program.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Maryland for a question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say to the Senator from Iowa, in all seriousness, that I have listened to this discussion now for 25 minutes, and I respectfully ask him if he does not think we would get a decision more quickly if we were to take a recess for 10 minutes, to find out if the Senators on the other side of the aisle cannot agree on a program, rather than have this open discussion on the floor?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama for a question.

Mr. HILL. In the form of a question, I make the suggestion, why does not the Senator from Iowa ask that, as in legislative session, we proceed, without further debate, to vote on the pending joint resolution proposing a constitutional amendment and get it out of the way? Why does not the Senator do that?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield now to the Senator from Massachusetts for a question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it may be out of keeping for me to interrupt the levity which is being indulged by my friends on the other side of the aisle, but I should like to ask a question relative to the subject matter which is now before the Senate. Am I to understand that we are to vote on all these names en bloc, including the members of the Commission and the General Manager?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, that is not my understanding, and it was not my request. I suggested that, rather than having the issue drawn on the consideration of one, the General Manager, who is in fact a subordinate of the Commission, the Senate agree to consider the members of the Commission more or less en bloc, without prejudice to the method of voting, but if the Senate desires to take them one by one and vote, I have no objection to that, or if the Senate desires to vote on them eventually en bloc, after debate, I have no objection.

Mr. LODGE. Were they voted on en bloc, or individually, in the committee?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. They were voted on individually in the committee.

Mr. LODGE. And is it proper to ask whether the vote was the same for all, or was it different in different cases?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It was not the same in every case. I do not have the exact record before me on paper, but I think I can give it to the Senator accurately, if he desires it.

Mr. LODGE. If it be proper and does not reveal a confidence, I think it would be of interest.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It was a matter of public announcement. The committee decided it was not a matter of executive business to be kept within the committee. I can furnish the information if the Senator desires.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I should like to have the information.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The vote on Mr. Lilienthal was eight affirmative and one negative, the membership of the committee being nine. The vote on Mr. Bacher was eight affirmative, one not voting. The vote on Mr. Pike was six affirmative, two negative, one not voting. The vote on Mr. Strauss was eight affirmative, one not voting. The vote on Mr. Waymack was eight affirmative, one not voting. The vote on Mr. Wilson was six affirmative, two negative, one not voting.

Mr. President, I am drawing on my memory for those details. I believe they are accurate. I cannot at the moment guarantee the accuracy until the records of the committee are introduced, but I believe the figures I have given are accurate.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask one more question.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for a question.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand, the Senator hopes that the whole question will be discussed as a unit, but of course, when the Senate starts to vote it must vote on each nomination individually. Is not that correct?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I think the activities of the members of the Commission, their abilities and responsibilities, are so interlocked that we can do a better job if we discuss them if they are all before us, not necessarily as a unit. I think perhaps there is great merit in voting on them individually. I see no objection to bringing them up one at a time and letting Members of the Senate express their various opinions on their merits by the votes cast.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator know why the name of Mr. Wilson is at the head of the list?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I have no information about that. I handed in the committee recommendations on Mr. Wilson as General Manager and on the members of the Commission at the same time. It might be the nomination of General Manager was on one recommendation form, the nomination of the five commissioners, including the Chairman, was on another form. It is entirely possible that the printer, or someone at the desk, may have set them up in this order, arbitrarily; I do not know.

Mr. LODGE. Has the Senator from Iowa requested that Mr. Wilson's name follow the names of the members of the Commission?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. No, Mr. President; I have not suggested that. My suggestion is that they all be tossed into a box, be considered together, and voted on separately, if the Senators desire. They are all so tied up and so involved with the responsibilities of each other in the management of the Commission that I think they all ought to be tossed into a box and considered at the same time.

Mr. LODGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for the information.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, we hoped to take up the Lilienthal matter this evening and get the debate started, but the session has run so long that it seems to me the best procedure, if there are no more 2-hour speeches, would be to vote on the constitutional amendment joint resolution tonight, and then put the Lilienthal matter over until Friday.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. TAFT. If that is agreeable to the Senate, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hayden	Myers
Baldwin	Hickenlooper	O'Conor
Ball	Hill	O'Daniel

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] has the floor.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 27), proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of House Joint Resolution 27.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has the right to make the motion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.]

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, on the pending question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, before we cast our votes on this important question I desire to make one or two comments upon what has happened here during the last hour. On two different occasions during the day I made request of the leadership on the other side of the aisle respecting what the program would be in order that I might inform Senators on this side. On both occasions I was given to understand from the floor that the Senate would complete action on House Joint Resolution 27, and thereafter would proceed to consider the portal-to-portal pay bill, following which the nominations of those appointed to the Atomic Energy Commission would be considered.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I want to say, and I think the Senator from Illinois will respect my statement in this regard, that what I have stated was precisely what I believed the situation to be respecting the agreement which had been entered into.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not doubt that at all. What the Senator said from his place this afternoon and what the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] said when I asked him that question I am satisfied was the arrangement. Under that theory we on this side were to notify Senators who were not on the floor to be present in order that they might cast their votes sometime this evening on House Joint Resolution 27. I want to say that I am very grateful to the leadership on the other side for finally getting around to the point where they followed the original program that had been agreed upon in the Senate. Otherwise, I would have felt that it would have been necessary for me to apologize to all the Democratic Members for keeping them here this late at night in order to vote on House Joint Resolution 27, because it was definitely understood that once House Joint Resolution 27 was passed, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] would take the floor and probably speak for a couple of hours, and some Senators, a little older perhaps than myself, might have been able to go home and get a little more rest than they would have gotten otherwise.

Mr. President, I bring up this matter in order to advise Members on the other side of the aisle that we hope that from now on, when they make an agreement and tell the Senate what the program is, and keep Senators here as late as they have done in order to vote on House Joint Resolution 27, they will not then leave us in the lurch on the spur of the moment for some other matter. I am grateful for the change in program, and I think all other Senators on this side are grateful.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the program contemplated a vote early in the day on House Joint Resolution 27. It was not expected that it would be debated at length all afternoon and all evening. Everything that was to be said on it had been said. Nevertheless the debate continued. It disrupted all the plans, which involved taking up the portal-to-portal pay measure this afternoon and seeing how far we could get with it before turning to the Lilienthal nomination. It was repeatedly stated that the Lilienthal nomination was to be taken up this evening.

Unfortunately the plans were disrupted. I regret very much that that was the fact. But I do not see how Senators can foresee the length of debate. Perhaps we were mistaken in assuming that the debate would be shorter than it proved to be.

Now the question is on the passage of the joint resolution, which I think is in such form that anyone who is in favor of the principle of limiting the number of terms a President may serve can properly support it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ELLENDER (when Mr. OVERTON'S name was called). As I announced earlier today, my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] was compelled to leave the Chamber because of illness. His pair and his position on this question will be announced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] are paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. The Senator from Washington is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] are paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. The Senator from Wyoming is absent because of illness. If present and voting, he would vote "yea." The Senator from Nevada is necessarily absent on State business. If present and voting, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] are paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. The Senator from Nebraska is absent because of illness. If present and voting, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are detained on public business.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who are necessarily absent, would vote "yea" if present.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], who is necessarily absent, would vote "nay" if present.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], who would vote "yea" if present, are paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who would vote "nay" if present.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], who would vote

"yea" if present, are paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], who would vote "nay" if present.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE], who would vote "yea" if present, are paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who would vote "nay" if present.

The result was announced—yeas 59, nays 23, as follows:

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WILEY, Mr. FERGUSON, Mr. REVERCOMB, Mr. MCCARRAN, and Mr. EASTLAND conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, previously I had asked that after House Joint Resolution 27 was disposed of the order of business be the portal-to-portal pay bill. Objection came from the Democratic side of the Senate. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 2157, Calendar No. 44.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

ADDITIONAL BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. MYERS introduced a bill (S. 886) authorizing the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, and the United States Maritime Commission to dispose of certain materials to the United States Coast Guard Auxiliary, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

RECESS TO FRIDAY

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] would not wish at this time to begin a discussion of the bill. I therefore move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Friday, March 14, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God be merciful unto us and bless us, and cause His face to shine upon us; that Thy way may be known upon earth, Thy saving health among all nations. Let the people praise Thee, O God, let all the people praise Thee. O let the nations be glad and sing for joy: for Thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth. Let the people praise Thee, O God; let all the people praise Thee. Then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our own God, shall bless us. God shall bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear Him.

Let us pray together our Lord's Prayer:

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever.

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE MARSHALL W. PICKERING

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. I announce to the House the death of Mr. Marshall W. Pickering, clerk of the majority room. The passing of this faithful public servant and true friend of mine comes as a great personal loss. I have known Marshall W. Pickering for more than half a century. He has served the Members of the House of Representatives well, faithfully, and efficiently for 38 years. To us older Members he has always been known affectionately as "Pick." Mr. Pickering was at all times charitable in his thoughts and in his actions. He always thought charitably of his friends and his neighbors. I never knew him to fail to help in a material way, as well as by kindly encouragement, unfortunate persons, whether in the time of their financial straits or in time of illness or in sorrow.

A quiet, modest, unassuming man, always making great sacrifice for others, Christmas was a holy day for Marshall Pickering. Long before Christmas he knew of many deserving and desperately poor persons who were likely to be overlooked by organized charity, and to these persons he delivered presents and good cheer.

I have known of his taking many a jobless young man and, after outfitting him with new clothes, he would then assist his friend to get a position.

Marshall Pickering has been responsible for giving many a discouraged person a new start in life. Charity, kindness, helpfulness were a part of the warp and woof of his sterling character. To know Marshall Pickering was to love and respect him. I mourn his passing as a personal loss. My sympathy and that of my family I extend to his bereaved wife and relatives.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. COFFIN].

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, as a baby Congressman, I desire to join with my colleague from New York in paying a tribute to the memory of my friend, Marshall Pickering. When I first came down here, he went very much out of his way to be helpful to me, as he did to all the other new Members, in assisting us to get our offices organized and getting ready to participate in the work of the Eightieth Congress. In many ways he proved to be a real friend to all of us and to myself in particular.

As I think of him a quotation from Kipling's Recessional comes to my mind:

The tumult and the shouting dies;
The captains and the kings depart:
Still stands Thine ancient sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart.

The last two lines of this quotation, in my judgment, aptly apply to Marshall Pickering. He was neither captain nor king and his name did not appear on the front pages of our newspapers in connection with the work of organizing the Eightieth Congress. Nevertheless, he was always there behind the scenes to render faithful and devoted service to all who asked his help. No one was more helpful to me and to the other new Members of this House, and there are many who bear witness to the fact that this has been an outstanding characteristic of his useful life for 38 years on Capitol Hill.

We shall miss Marshall Pickering in the days to come. I join my esteemed colleague from New York in paying a heartfelt tribute of sorrow, respect, and love to the memory of a true friend.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL].

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, it was with great shock that I heard the announcement of the death of our majority clerk, Mr. Pickering. I, as one Member from New York, want to say that he was one of the finest friends I have ever known. Coming here in 1939, I had an opportunity to utilize the friendship and help and assistance which Mr. Pickering extended to all new Members. I feel this loss deeply, because I know we are all bereft of a great friend. I know the entire Republican majority, as well as the rest, feel likewise, especially those Members who have been here several years. I really got to know Mr. Pickering intimately.

His passing reminds me of the sentence Mark Antony said in Julius Caesar:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

ALASKA, HAWAII, AND PUERTO RICO

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter from Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president emeritus of Columbia University.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to a matter which I think is of sufficient importance to call to the attention of my colleagues in the House, even though at the moment it may be premature. It has to do with the proposal to admit the Hawaiian Islands as a State in our Union.

I received this morning a letter from Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president emeritus of Columbia University, one of our very great distinguished citizens, expressing the most emphatic objection and dissent. He expresses his views with his usual force and clarity. I think the subject is of great significance worthy of the most careful attention in Congress and out.

I hope my colleagues will take advantage of the opportunity to read his views as expressed in his letter, which will appear in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 7, 1947.

HON. JULIUS A. KRUG,
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: May I call to your attention a matter which I regard of extreme importance to the Government and people of the United States. Under no circumstances should Alaska, Hawaii, or Puerto Rico, or any other outlying island or territory be admitted as a State in our Federal Union. To do so, in my judgment, would mark the beginning of the end of the United States as we have known it and as it has become so familiar and so useful to the world. Our country now consists of a sound and compact area, bounded by Canada, by Mexico, and by the two oceans. To add outlying territory hundreds or thousands of miles away, with what certainly must be different interests from ours and very different background, might easily mark, as I said, the beginning of the end.

Think of what would happen were the vote of one Senator from Alaska or Hawaii or Puerto Rico to defeat the ratification of an important treaty affecting the policy and good order of the world. It is unthinkable that we should allow any such possibility.

On the other hand, I suggest that each one of these Territories—Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico—be set up, by treaty, as an independent and self-governing nation, subject to but two limitations. These are, first, that their relations with foreign powers should be subject to the approval of the President of the United States and the United States Senate. This would prevent any foreign power from using them to our disadvantage. The second is that litigants in any one of these countries should have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The effect of this would be to establish a uniform system of public and civil law in this part of the world. This privilege now exists in the case of Puerto Rico and I am told works extremely well.

I earnestly ask your most serious consideration of this proposal and the avoidance of the damage that would be done to our Government and our people by extending the United States beyond its present very compact and naturally defined boundaries.

I regret that on account of my total blindness, I cannot sign this letter myself.

Sincerely yours,

NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from a Gold Star Mother.

Mr. BENNETT of Missouri asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article from this morning's Washington Post.

Mr. FORAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial and a letter.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that upon the completion of business on the Speaker's desk and on the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 10 minutes today.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks and include the minority report on S. 110.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

[Mr. FOLGER addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks and include an article by Mason J. Dixon on the subject of the FEPC.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

THE QUESTION OF STATEHOOD FOR HAWAII, ALASKA, AND PUERTO RICO

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COUDERT] concerning the matter of statehood for Hawaii, Alaska, and Puerto Rico, I wish to point out that in 1944 one of the national platforms, if not both of them, included a recommendation that Hawaii, at least, be made a State of the Union. Without taking any position on the matter at all at this moment, I do want to say I think it goes to the fundamentals, and the question we have to answer is whether we are going to begin making States out of possessions that are not contiguous to the United States of America. I think it is a deep fundamental question that we will have to meet one day, and we had better put our best thinking on it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has expired.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the House in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Speaker.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.

The President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and stood at the Clerk's desk. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, I have the distinguished honor of presenting to you the President of the United States.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—GREECE, TURKEY, AND THE MIDDLE EAST (H. DOC. NO. 171)

The PRESIDENT. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Congress of the United States, the gravity of the situation which confronts the world today necessitates my appearance before a joint session of the Congress.

The foreign policy and the national security of this country are involved.

One aspect of the present situation, which I wish to present to you at this time for your consideration and decision, concerns Greece and Turkey.

The United States has received from the Greek Government an urgent appeal for financial and economic assistance. Preliminary reports from the American economic mission now in Greece and reports from the American Ambassador in Greece corroborate the statement of the Greek Government that assistance is imperative if Greece is to survive as a free nation.

I do not believe that the American people and the Congress wish to turn a deaf ear to the appeal of the Greek Government.

Greece is not a rich country. Lack of sufficient natural resources has always forced the Greek people to work hard to make both ends meet. Since 1940, this industrious and peace-loving country has suffered invasion, 4 years of cruel enemy occupation, and bitter internal strife.

When forces of liberation entered Greece they found that the retreating Germans had destroyed virtually all the railways, roads, port facilities, communications, and merchant marine. More than a thousand villages had been burned. Eighty-five percent of the children were tubercular. Livestock, poultry, and draft animals had almost disappeared. Inflation had wiped out practically all savings.

As a result of these tragic conditions, a militant minority, exploiting human want and misery, was able to create political chaos which, until now, has made economic recovery impossible.

Greece is today without funds to finance the importation of those goods which are essential to bare subsistence. Under these circumstances the people of Greece cannot make progress in solving their problems of reconstruction. Greece is in desperate need of financial and economic assistance to enable it to resume purchases of food, clothing, fuel, and seeds. These are indispensable for the subsistence of its people and are obtainable only from abroad. Greece must have help to import the goods necessary to restore internal order and security so essential for economic and political recovery.

The Greek Government has also asked for the assistance of experienced American administrators, economists, and technicians to insure that the financial and other aid given to Greece shall be used effectively in creating a stable and self-sustaining economy and in improving its public administration.

The very existence of the Greek state is today threatened by the terrorist activities of several thousand armed men, led by Communists, who defy the Government's authority at a number of points, particularly along the northern boundaries. A commission appointed by the United Nations Security Council is at present investigating disturbed conditions in northern Greece and alleged border violations along the frontier between Greece on the one hand and Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia on the other.

Meanwhile, the Greek Government is unable to cope with the situation. The Greek Army is small and poorly equipped. It needs supplies and equipment if it is to restore the authority of the Government throughout Greek territory.

Greece must have assistance if it is to become a self-supporting and self-respecting democracy.

The United States must supply this assistance. We have already extended to Greece certain types of relief and economic aid but these are inadequate.

There is no other country to which democratic Greece can turn.

No other nation is willing and able to provide the necessary support for a democratic Greek Government.

The British Government, which has been helping Greece, can give no further financial or economic aid after March 31. Great Britain finds itself under the necessity of reducing or liquidating its commitments in several parts of the world, including Greece.

We have considered how the United Nations might assist in this crisis. But the situation is an urgent one requiring immediate action, and the United Nations and its related organizations are not in a position to extend help of the kind that is required.

It is important to note that the Greek Government has asked for our aid in utilizing effectively the financial and other assistance we may give to Greece, and in improving its public administration. It is of the utmost importance that we supervise the use of any funds made available to Greece [applause], in such a manner that each dollar spent will count toward making Greece self-supporting, and will help to build an economy in which a healthy democracy can flourish.

No government is perfect. One of the chief virtues of a democracy, however, is that its defects are always visible and under democratic processes can be pointed out and corrected. The Government of Greece is not perfect. Nevertheless it represents 85 percent of the members of the Greek Parliament who were chosen in an election last year. Foreign observers, including 692 Americans, considered this election to be a fair expression of the views of the Greek people.

The Greek Government has been operating in an atmosphere of chaos and extremism. It has made mistakes. The extension of aid by this country does not mean that the United States condones everything that the Greek Government has done or will do. We have condemned in the past, and we condemn now, extremist measures of the right or the left. We have in the past advised tolerance, and we advise tolerance now.

Greece's neighbor, Turkey, also deserves our attention.

The future of Turkey as an independent and economically sound state is clearly no less important to the freedom-loving peoples of the world than the future of Greece. The circumstances in which Turkey finds itself today are considerably different from those of Greece. Turkey has been spared the disasters that have beset Greece. And during the war, the United States and Great Britain furnished Turkey with material aid.

Nevertheless, Turkey now needs our support.

Since the war, Turkey has sought financial assistance from Great Britain and the United States for the purpose of effecting that modernization necessary for the maintenance of its national integrity.

That integrity is essential to the preservation of order in the Middle East.

The British Government has informed us that, owing to its own difficulties, it can no longer extend financial or economic aid to Turkey.

As in the case of Greece, if Turkey is to have the assistance it needs, the United States must supply it. We are the only country able to provide that help.

I am fully aware of the broad implications involved if the United States extends assistance to Greece and Turkey, and I shall discuss these implications with you at this time.

One of the primary objectives of the foreign policy of the United States is the creation of conditions in which we and other nations will be able to work out a way of life free from coercion. This was a fundamental issue in the war with Germany and Japan. Our victory was won over countries which sought to impose their will, and their way of life, upon other nations.

To insure the peaceful development of nations, free from coercion, the United States has taken a leading part in establishing the United Nations. The United Nations is designed to make possible lasting freedom and independence for all its members. We shall not realize our objectives, however, unless we are willing to help free peoples to maintain their free institutions and their national integrity against aggressive movements that seek to impose upon them totalitarian regimes. [Applause.] This is no more than a frank recognition that totalitarian regimes imposed on free peoples, by direct or indirect aggression, undermine the foundations of international peace and hence the security of the United States.

The peoples of a number of countries of the world have recently had totalitarian regimes forced upon them against their will. The Government of the United States has made frequent protests against coercion and intimidation, in violation of the Yalta agreement, in Poland, Rumania, and Bulgaria. I must also state that in a number of other countries there have been similar developments.

At the present moment in world history nearly every nation must choose between alternative ways of life. The choice is too often not a free one.

One way of life is based upon the will of the majority, and is distinguished by free institutions, representative government, free elections, guaranties of individual liberty, freedom of speech and religion, and freedom from political oppression.

The second way of life is based upon the will of a minority forcibly imposed upon the majority. It relies upon terror and oppression, a controlled press and radio, fixed elections, and the suppression of personal freedoms.

I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures.

I believe that we must assist free peoples to work out their own destinies in their own way.

I believe that our help should be primarily through economic and financial aid, which is essential to economic stability and orderly political processes.

The world is not static and the status quo is not sacred. But we cannot allow changes in the status quo in violation of the Charter of the United Nations by such methods as coercion, or by such subterfuges as political infiltration. In helping free and independent nations to maintain their freedom, the United States will be giving effect to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

It is necessary only to glance at a map to realize that the survival and integrity of the Greek nation are of grave importance in a much wider situation. If Greece should fall under the control of an armed minority, the effect upon its neighbor, Turkey, would be immediate and serious. Confusion and disorder might well spread throughout the entire Middle East.

Moreover, the disappearance of Greece as an independent state would have a profound effect upon those countries in Europe whose peoples are struggling against great difficulties to maintain their freedoms and their independence while they repair the damages of war.

It would be an unspeakable tragedy if these countries, which have struggled so long against overwhelming odds, should lose that victory for which they sacrificed so much. Collapse of free institutions and loss of independence would be disastrous not only for them but for the world. Discouragement and possibly failure would quickly be the lot of neighboring peoples striving to maintain their freedom and independence.

Should we fail to aid Greece and Turkey in this fateful hour, the effect will be far reaching to the West as well as to the East.

We must take immediate and resolute action.

I therefore ask the Congress to provide authority for assistance to Greece and Turkey in the amount of $400,000,000 for the period ending June 30, 1948. In requesting these funds, I have taken into consideration the maximum amount of relief assistance which would be furnished to Greece out of the $350,000,000 which I recently requested that the Congress authorize for the prevention of starvation and suffering in countries devastated by the war.

In addition to funds, I ask the Congress to authorize the detail of American civilian and military personnel to Greece and Turkey, at the request of those countries, to assist in the tasks of reconstruction, and for the purpose of supervising the use of such financial and material assistance as may be furnished. I recommend that authority also be provided for the instruction and training of selected Greek and Turkish personnel.

Finally, I ask that the Congress provide authority which will permit the speediest and most effective use, in terms of needed commodities, supplies, and equipment, of such funds as may be authorized.

If further funds, or further authority, should be needed for purposes indicated in this message, I shall not hesitate to bring the situation before the Congress. On this subject the executive and legislative branches of the Government must work together.

This is a serious course upon which we embark.

I would not recommend it except that the alternative is much more serious. [Applause.]

The United States contributed $341,000,000,000 toward winning World War II. This is an investment in world freedom and world peace.

The assistance that I am recommending for Greece and Turkey amounts to little more than one-tenth of 1 percent of this investment. It is only common sense that we should safeguard this investment and make sure that it was not in vain.

The seeds of totalitarian regimes are nurtured by misery and want. They spread and grow in the evil soil of poverty and strife. They reach their full growth when the hope of a people for a better life has died.

We must keep that hope alive.

The free peoples of the world look to us for support in maintaining their freedoms.

If we falter in our leadership, we may endanger the peace of the world—and we shall surely endanger the welfare of our own Nation.

Great responsibilities have been placed upon us by the swift movement of events.

I am confident that the Congress will face these responsibilities squarely. [Applause, the Members rising.]

At 1 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m., the President retired from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The members of the President's Cabinet retired from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

There was no objection.

IMPORT TAX ON COPPER

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 140, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2404) to suspend certain import taxes on copper. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same back to the House with such amendments as shall have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution would make in order the immediate consideration of H. R. 2404, a bill to suspend certain import taxes on copper. The enactment of this bill would make it possible for American copper users to buy their supplies in foreign markets without paying a price far above that paid by other countries. At present there is no economic reason for this tariff. Domestic producers of copper realize that they cannot produce enough to meet even domestic demand, and they do not oppose this bill. For many years, this country produced enough copper to meet domestic demand, and was a large exporter of the commodity. At that time a tariff was feasible to protect domestic producers, and Congress levied a tax on foreign imports of copper amounting to $80 a ton. But now the situation has changed altogether. Domestic producers can supply only 75,000 short tons of copper a month, while domestic consumption is about 140,000 short tons. To fill this gap, the Metals Reserve Company has supplied 50,000 to 60,000 tons a month. But Government stock piles of copper will probably be exhausted within a month. Unless some remedy for this situation is forthcoming, industrial users of copper will be forced to curtail their operations, and the result will be widespread unemployment in the copper-fabricating industry and other industries depending for supplies upon copper manufacturers. It is the purpose of this bill to remove for 3 years the tariff barrier to the importation of copper.

H. R. 2404 was reported unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means, and this resolution was reported unanimously by the Rules Committee. It is a completely nonpartisan measure, and little controversy is likely to develop in debate on the bill. Therefore, the Committee on Rules has provided but 1 hour of general debate. Amendments under the 5-minute rule and one motion to recommit have been provided should an objection arise to any portion of the bill.

This resolution embodies a general rule, simply providing for the consideration of this important bill.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I have no comment on the bill itself; I think it is a good idea, but I do ask the Rules Committee if the length of time was discussed. It seems to me important, in view of the uncertain world conditions, that the period should be shorter than that mentioned in the bill.

Mr. HERTER. I may say to the gentleman from California that the Rules Committee is not empowered to amend legislation that comes before it.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Then I shall reserve my question until the bill is taken up for consideration.

Mr. HERTER. It is my understanding that an amendment along that very line will be offered from the floor.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

RULE AND BILL SHOULD PASS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts has thoroughly explained the rule and also the bill.

The Ways and Means Committee, after having heard many witnesses, reported this bill and requested a rule which was unanimously granted. This relief is needed immediately because manufacturers who use copper and metals alloyed with copper need it to get additional copper to permit them to continue in the production of many necessities that are in great demand.

We are, of course, a rich nation. We grow and produce more than any other nation in the world; nevertheless we cannot produce everything and our needs require that from time to time we obtain raw materials from other countries; consequently, the Democratic Party for many years has believed we should bear that in mind and not close our doors or preclude the importation of needed raw materials to permit us to continue to be the greatest manufacturing and producing nation. Our friends on the left have charged us with being free traders, which, of course, was not correct or justified. We have always been for tariffs, but for revenue only.

SMOOT-HAWLEY TARIFF PRECIPITATED WORLD DEPRESSION

The Republicans honestly believed, I suppose, that when they passed the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, they were acting to safeguard American industry and American workers from foreign competition. We know now that the Smoot-Hawley tariff, with its unscalable economic walls and its interference with private enterprise, helped to precipitate world-wide depression and stagnation and to create the conditions in which Nazi-fascism and other totalitarian systems were able to impose their tyrannies and to threaten the whole world with slavery or destruction.

Even Republicans, or most of them, know now that trade is a two-way street. We cannot always sell and never buy. Not only did we restrict world trade with that act, and sow the seeds of world war, but we injured our own foreign commerce and exhausted or deeply depleted our own precious reserves of minerals and natural resources.

RECIPROCAL TRADE TREATIES ARE REMEDY

By this time, I take it, my Republican friends, except for a few die-hards who would like to build a Chinese wall around our borders and cut off all intercourse with the rest of humanity, will agree now that the reciprocal trade treaties, so wisely devised by the late President Roosevelt and his great Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, are the proper instruments for our foreign trade, so that we can exchange our surplus crops or our manufactured goods for raw materials that we need and do not have.

As I have said, we are the greatest manufacturing country in the world and for years we have been the greatest agricultural country in the world.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I am sorry; I cannot yield now.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I just wanted to say something else we were great in.

Mr. SABATH. I know the gentleman wants to say something else, but I do not think he can enlighten me on this.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I want to agree with the gentleman. Can he not let me make a contributing observation?

Mr. SABATH. I am indeed gratified and immensely pleased that the gentleman from Michigan will agree with me and does agree with me at this time.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman does not want to accept it before I say it, does he?

Mr. SABATH. I hope the gentleman will agree with me many times from now on because I always try to be right and bring light and information not only to the gentleman but to the membership of the House and to the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to detain the House longer because this bill deserves immediate consideration and should be passed without delay. I am indeed gratified that the majority has seen fit to realize and understand that the position of the Democrats has been always right, and in the best interests of the Nation, and we owe our pre-eminence in world industry, and our capacity to become the arsenal of democracy, and the granary of democracy, during the war, to the wise and prudent policies of the Democratic administrations.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] seemed so enraptured with his own words and his own thoughts so intent that he would not yield. He spoke about this being a great nation and the many things in which it has been first for so many years. I want to agree with him on that. It is the most powerful nation. But it is also the nation that can get into more wars, fight more wars for other people than any other nation in all the world. The thing that the President today did not tell us was how much of an effort we are going to make, how many dollars are involved, how many tons of munitions and supplies for war will be needed, how many men we are going to send into World War III. If he will tell us more about those matters I am sure those who will be the veterans and veterans' dependents of World War III will be much interested.

Mr. SABATH. I am not speaking for the President.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there is no reason in the world why this rule should not be adopted and, as far as that is concerned, adopted with a minimum of discussion. However, it is always proper to explain just what the rule does and what the bill provides when it comes up for consideration.

This bill provides for the elimination of the import tax on copper up to March 31, 1950. The tax now being 4 cents per pound. The idea being to relieve the shortage of copper in this country.

The Ways and Means Committee has reported this bill unanimously. There is no opposition apparently from either side of the House.

The rule provides for immediate consideration of this copper bill. The bill recognizes the fact that today in this country there is a great shortage of raw copper and it provides, as I have said, for the importation of copper into the country free of any duty. The duty is to be taken off for a certain period of time. That time limitation is March 31, 1950.

Those of you who are protectionists may rest assured that we have followed this through very carefully, with the idea of not doing violence to the traditional protection policies of the Republican Party. The testimony was overwhelming that this commodity is sadly needed in the country. The testimony comes from practically all producers of copper and copper goods, from the biggest and most important industries down to the smallest industry engaged in the manufacture of copper and copper products. For this reason I expect to support the rule and the bill. As soon as domestic production approaches the domestic demand we can then restore the duty.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Does this bill take all tariffs off of copper?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It takes off of raw copper all of this import tax but not off of commodities made of copper.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand it takes the import tax off.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I was wondering if it takes all of the tariffs off of raw copper?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; every tax and duty comes off the raw copper. I mean by that, that we will not change the duty on articles made of copper. Those foreign-made commodities already manufactured will bear the regular duty.

Mr. RANKIN. I notice the time is limited to 1950.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I am wondering whether it would not be best just to strike out in line 7, all after the word "act" for this reason. Now, you are going to start your manufacturing in this country, and it is going to take them some time to get geared up to manufacture things made of copper, and leaving this deadline of 1950 in there may have a deterrent effect on them. We need many things now, especially transformers, in which copper is used in the manufacture. What I am afraid of is that if you leave that deadline in there, you are deterring the manufacturers in this country from going into the business.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. We could not agree to that change. That proposition was discussed very considerably in the committee, and there was no sentiment of any consequence to that effect. The purpose of this legislation is to meet a serious scarcity of a very necessary commodity. As soon as that serious scarcity has been relieved Congress can, and no doubt will, restore that duty. The gentleman will, as this debate continues, find that the Congressmen from New Mexico and Arizona and Montana, all of whom are Democrats and free traders, generally will be ardent in their demand for the maintenance of a protective tariff on copper.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The testimony before the committee was to the effect that a different date was submitted, but this was the farthest-off date that was suggested. Some wanted 1 and 2 years, but 3 was the limit which was proposed by any witness before the committee.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. This was the date finally agreed upon unanimously.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. That rather answers the question in my mind. As I understand it, there was no inclination in the minds of the committee to effect a permanent repeal, but it was to be rather in the nature of a temporary suspension, the only question being the length of time that the suspension would be effective. After the termination of the time of the suspension, of course, the committee and the Congress can take a look at the existing situation and determine what properly ought to be done.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No doubt they will, because the small producers of copper in the country will be able to function, and by that time we hope the industry will have stabilized itself, and if they need protection, we will have to give it to them. There is no intention to place any additional burden on the small producers. I am as jealous for the best welfare of the small producers as any Member. In fact, I would not support this measure if I thought it would be to the disadvantage of the small producers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. A date beyond 1950 might be too far, and we would be confronted then with complaints from many of the small producers of the country, and they would complain justly, and the purpose of the committee was to extend the date as far as practicable in accordance with the testimony of the experts that we had before us.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman mentioned a bit ago our hope that in due course, perhaps 2, 3, or 4 years, the domestic producers of copper may again need protection from foreign competition. It is interesting to note that the State Department is presently including, in connection with new reciprocal trade agreements—copper. The rate thus can be reduced on these agreements on a long-term basis, to the permanent injury o our domestic industry. We believe this protection should be continued as it is today, subject only to a temporary suspension which this bill now provides.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I wish to reiterate my statement that there was no tendency anywhere to put any undue burden on the small producers of copper. On the contrary this date was fixed as the maximum date so that we felt sure that it would do the job intended and at the same time would not encroach upon the rights and privileges of the small producers of copper in the country.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the message we heard today delivered by President Truman was not only a courageous message but a historic message. It was a message that will reverberate throughout the world.

I have repeatedly said on the floor of the House, and publicly, that all the countries of the world are either looking to the Kremlin or to the White House, to Moscow or Washington. I have stated that the peoples of most countries look toward Washington. If we fail them, of necessity, they are compelled to bend, through fear, to the influence of the Soviet Union.

Last July on the floor of the House I made a speech exposing the conditions that existed in Yugoslavia under the heartless and cruel dictator, Tito. At that time I had reliable information upon which I based the main premises of my speech. On January 23 the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] made a dramatic speech on the floor of this House and, being so impressed, and having some strong views of my own, I followed him. His was a powerful and able speech, and his main premise was that freedom is the great issue. On that occasion, supplementing what he said, I said, and I quote from the RECORD of January 23:

> The gentleman said "freedom" is the great issue. He is absolutely correct. He said that "Red fascisim" or "atheistic communism" is on the march. I have said that before. We might just as well face the facts. On July 27, 1946, in a speech on this floor, I exposed conditions existing in Yugoslavia under Tito. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] in my opinion, is absolutely correct in the issue involved in its broad aspect. We are confronted in the world of today with a clash of two concepts of life, one the Marxist concept, the state, all powerful, the state supreme, with its viciousness; and on the other hand, the western concept, the concept of those who believe in one God; Catholic, Protestant, or Jew, the Christian concept of life. There is a clash today, and we must face the situation and face the real conditions in a realistic manner. In doing this, there is no middle aisle dividing us. There are no Republicans and no Democrats on that issue. We are all concerned with the national interest of our country. We find the boring in; we find coalition governments; we find the taking over; we find the suppression of labor; we find the constant encroachment; we find the inability to have agreements made on fundamentals; the representatives of our country and other countries willing to do so, but always uncertainty, confusion, and chaos existing due to the practices and actions of the Soviet Union. We find the Balkan nations behind the iron curtain, except little Greece, and that country is besieged. We see conditions existing in China. All of these things should bring to our conscious mind, those of us who believe in the concept of life that we do, that our way of life is being challenged.

I said it then, and I believe it now. I base my position upon the national interest of the United States of America. I say that it is not for the national interest of our country to see Greece denied assistance by the United States; to see Greece through our failure, through our default, subjected to those pressures which we know exist on the part of a minority, and which under certain conditions could take control of the country and the people. When such a minority takes control of a government, and with the power of government imposes its will upon the people of a country, despite the fact that the great majority of the people of that country are not in agreement with the dictatorial, totalitarian oligarchy that has wrested the powers of their government unlawfully from the people, I say it is not for the national interest of the United States.

My sentiment for Greece is great, but I am concerned with the national interest of my country. I say it is not for the national interest of my country to see Turkey, as well as Greece, become subject to the influence of that same orbit, the Soviet orbit. I say it is not in the interest of my country, the United States of America, to see Italy, or France, or Spain, go under the control of the Communists. I say it is not in the national interest of my country to see China subject to the influence of the Soviet orbit.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. At the outset of the gentleman's remarks he said the world now looks to the Kremlin or the White House.

Mr. McCORMACK. I used the expression in a descriptive sense.

Mr. VORYS. May I suggest, and I know the gentleman will agree with me, that that was merely a passing reference. If we want to face our responsibility fully on the floor of this House, we would say, and the gentleman would say, that the world looks to the Kremlin or the Capitol of the United States where the President has just given a message to the Congress and where the gentlemen and others are speaking of responsibilities that are not merely the responsibility of the White House but the responsibility of the peoples' representatives here.

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly.

Mr. VORYS. It would seem to me well to call attention to the fact that the world is looking at the Capitol of the United States and is listening to this debate.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman has interpreted my remarks correctly, and I am glad that he has made the observation because later in my talk I said "Moscow or Washington." I accept the suggestion to say that the world is looking to the Kremlin or to the Capitol of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman. Many times we have been together on this question on the infiltration of communism into this country. But this unfortunately is one of the questions on which we differ. During this last year we were arming Tito, and now we are beginning apparently to pay for it with blood of our boys. That is where the biggest part of the war material went that we sent over.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is raising another question which I shall not go into at present, but I would condemn that as much as anyone else if that were a fact.

Mr. REED of New York. It is a fact.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not challenging the statement of my friend because I am satisfied that Tito was using our assistance to further his own purposes. So, you see, I am not challenging the statement of the gentleman, but to what extent it was used is another question.

I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. MERROW. I wish to compliment the gentleman from Massachusetts on the splendid statement that he is making. If we fail to assist Greece and Turkey, as the President has suggested this morning, will not the Mediterranean become a Soviet lake, and will not the security of the United States then be imperiled, and will not the leadership of the United States of America be placed in jeopardy?

Mr. McCORMACK. The answer to that, in my opinion, is simply yes, and I will give my reasons. It is my opinion, for whatever it may be worth, the nation that controls the Mediterranean controls Europe, and the nation that controls Europe controls Asia and Africa. I believe I have given the gentleman the reason for my answer.

I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD].

Mr. JUDD. I rise to join my voice with others in paying tribute to the distinguished former majority leader for the statement that he is making today, and especially because of the fact that he has been willing to make forthright statements on this issue in days when it was not popular in many quarters to make it.

Does not the gentleman feel also that as we stand today at this crossroad we should add to our sense of grave responsibility a sense of regret that in some degree we have been assisting a Communist minority in China in its efforts to overthrow the Chinese Government, which with all its weaknesses has steadfastly refused to yield to such internal and external pressures as today threaten Greece and Turkey? Whatever our intentions were, has not our policy resulted in weakening our ally, the Government of China, and strengthening the Communist minority? Will the gentleman agree with that statement?

Mr. McCORMACK. In answer to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota, I would observe that prior to last Monday I probably felt the same way as the gentleman did, but as a result of information, I can assure the gentleman there is no assistance being given to the Communists in China. I believe that when there is a more representative government established there, that affirmative action along the lines that the gentleman and I would agree should be extended over there.

Mr. JUDD. I want to make quite clear I was not suggesting that the United States has been giving direct assistance to the Communists of China; but the inevitable, inescapable result of our policy of trying to bring the minority Communists into the Chinese Government and failing to support effectively that government while helping to correct its weaknesses has been to strengthen the Communists' position.

Mr. McCORMACK. Without doing anything—failure to do things helped them. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. JUDD. The gentleman and I are in complete agreement.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. COX. In view of the gentleman's statement, I have no desire to ask for recognition, but I purposed, however, to ask that the gentleman permit me to rephrase the question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] to say that might we not, with some sense of regret, look upon the fact that we probably have not rendered assistance to Chiang Kai-shek that was due him.

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot challenge that. I am not going to challenge it, but as a result of this message today, if the Congress supports the message, the issue is joined. I have always taken the position that our form of government is a dynamic, forward-looking form of government. There is nothing negative about democratic institutions of government. We have to act and think affirmatively. We have to be forward-looking in order to have a democracy serve a people. The totalitarian form is a destructive form of government. It is negative government. The issue is joined today by this message. No matter where it may lead us, the issue is joined. And I am glad the issue is joined, not because it happened to be President Truman. Entertaining the views that I do, if any other President had read that message I would have had a feeling of satisfaction as an American that the issue is joined throughout the world, and that the nations and peoples of the world know that the great United States is going to use its power for good, if the Congress will support the President, and its power to preserve the 2,000-year way of life that we are the inheritors of, and which we want to pass on to future generations of Americans and future generations elsewhere who believe in the concept of life that we do.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Just what does the gentleman mean when he says the issues are joined? It would seem to me the implications in the gentleman's statement would amount to a declaration of war.

Mr. McCORMACK. No. The gentleman knows that is not so. There is always a certain calculated risk in everything we do. The question is, "Which is the greater calculated risk, whether we are going to do nothing or whether we are going, through the measures recommended by the President, to take steps in accordance with his recommendations?" I will concede there is a certain calculated risk, but I say if we do nothing, and if we let Greece go and if we let Turkey go, that will be two. Then, in my opinion, it will be Italy and it will be France and it will be Spain and it will be all of Europe. I say that this calculated risk is far greater and more dangerous to the national interest of our country than the calculated risk recommended to us by the President of the United States.

Mr. JUDD. Is not this an accurate statement: we in the United States are not now joining the issues, we are merely belatedly recognizing that they have long been joined, not by our choice but by the choice of others. We are not rising to attack the way of life of others; we are rising to defend the general way of life in which we believe against attacks from others. We have not raised the issues; but we cannot longer blind ourselves to the fact that they have been raised and we cannot escape them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] has again expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. ROCKWELL].

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word about this bill that is before us at this time. The miners of my State of Colorado are rather worried about this reduction in the tariff on copper. We have many mines in my State which are small mines, marginal mines, and which produce copper, lead, zinc, and other raw material. Therefore, in order to protect those men and in order that we may be sure that we may have an adequate supply, I am going to offer an amendment at the proper time, which will read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the figures "1950" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1949."

In other words, in 2 years we will know whether there actually is a short supply and, thereby, give the marginal copper producers an opportunity to have this tariff put back on if it becomes necessary.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not hope to do much toward blocking the passage of this rule. I regret that the rule is brought before us today or that the bill which it makes in order is brought before us today, for I think this bill might have been so written as to pass under unanimous consent.

As I said to the Committee on Ways and Means when this bill was being considered in the committee, the mining people recognize that there is a shortage of copper in this country, a serious shortage; in fact, there is a world shortage. These mining people, the producers of copper, want to meet the manufacturers, the fabricators, and other consumers of copper part way in some trial period of suspending the duty. I believe if the committee had brought this in with a mere suspension of the 4-cent excise duty for 1 year, it could have been passed by unanimous consent. The bill however does not reach us in that form. The rule therefore is before us.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. There was not a single witness who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee who testified in his opinion that our domestic supply of copper would equal our domestic requirements in a year; and I am asking the gentleman from Arizona now if he believes there is any chance that domestic production within a year can meet domestic consumption?

Mr. MURDOCK. The same question was asked by the gentleman in the committee. I believe that within 12 months we will go far towards reaching the increased domestic production needed and will also be then better able to know what further needs to be done.

We do not dare assume too great a risk. I heard solemn tones here today as I listened to the Chief Executive from that desk and from our leaders on both sides of the aisle. This is no time, Mr. Speaker, to throw down the safeguards of domestic production of that most vitally necessary red metal which we need in national defense as this 3-year suspension would throw them down.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MURDOCK. Pardon me, I cannot yield now.

We are not in a position today to guard ourselves with this necessary military requirement. At this very moment our production of basic copper is less than it was in 1939 and 1941, although we have passed stock piling legislation; we have made arrangements for accumulations for national defense of strategic and critical minerals and metals but we have not accumulated the copper.

Oh, you say, let us suspend or even repeal the 4-cent duty now existing and get this copper in. But this legislation is not necessary for that. We can import all the foreign copper we please or need duty-free as a matter of national defense. We did it during the war, we can do it now if national defense demands it.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, I am informed by experts in the copper production field that the industry can stand a short suspension, say 1 year, and they are willing to do it in order that consumers may have this much needed product to meet the postwar demand. There is a great accumulation of demand for copper that creates this temporary shortage. I am not able to say when that shortage will be met by domestic production but I do say that if we suspend for only 1 year and at the end of the year's time we find there still remains a shortage, we can then continue the suspension.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. With reference to the question raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRANT], may I say that Mr. Hayes, Director of Metals and Minerals, Civilian Production Administration, appeared before the committee on the same day that we were there. He stated:

> I do not believe that it is wise to suspend that duty for too long a time. In my opinion, a suspension of the 4-cent duty until June 30, 1948, would be sufficient at the present time; then in the spring of 1948 you take another look at the picture.

I do not agree with him exactly, but at least that statement was made in the record that day.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; and he was one of the finest and most expert witnesses who appeared before the committee at that time. That was his statement. I hope the committee will heed his advice.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON].

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, we have listened today to what is perhaps one of the most historic messages ever given to this Congress. It makes very clear, as I interpret it, that we have two possible paths to follow. One might well mean guns, and the other might well mean a far more subtle method, one that requires a background of knowledge coupled with great wisdom. Without question this last would have the greater appeal for the people of this country.

We were told unequivocally that totalitarian expansion must be stopped. The method was very definitely laid upon us to work out. This novel procedure gives a clear indication that a new era is at hand.

Mr. Speaker, I am a woman, and, as a woman, I cannot agree that war measures—troops, equipment, and all that that means—are necessarily the only answer. I believe that the people of this country expect the Congress to do everything it is humanly possible to do to find a peaceful way. Do not misunderstand me; the peaceful way is not one of appeasement, rather is it one of clear, definite, positive action. This is no moment for weakness and negativeness, which are tools of the timid and the fearful. Nor is it Greece and Turkey alone that are involved in possible destruction. This is a moment when everything that man has built is in danger of tumbling around his ears. Wisdom and strength must be our tools as never before in the whole history of mankind.

So I contend that guns are not the only possible way to resolve the world problem of starvation, bound up as it is in the President's newly stated policy that totalitarian aggression must be stopped. You cannot eat guns, Mr. Speaker, and the people of Greece and other lands are starving. It would seem unthinkable not to feed the starving, but our people have the right to expect us to make every penny we put into food and other supplies do an honest job. They have the right to expect us to find ways to make every dollar count for ultimate freedom.

Just as we must be careful in our use of words so must we guard against carelessness in our actions. Let us also bear in mind that totalitarian aggression, while it is expressed in many ways, achieves its maximum results through poverty and hunger. To combat it we must put at least some food into empty stomachs and make it possible for these countries to reach out towards economic stability. Charity alone will not do the job. Loans will of necessity follow so that trade may once again flow. Such loans must be supervised by American experts in finance, industry, agriculture, and other fields so that they may be made to yield maximum results. Any other course will not only not benefit our friends but will wreck our own economy.

As a woman I dare risk a moment of prophecy, feeling as I do that our whole civilization is at stake. Is it not conceivable that we shall have to review our own method of economy particularly where it touches the other countries of the world?

To this end, Mr. Speaker, it is my earnest hope that this Congress will deal with these tremendous responsibilities with a sense of consecration on a basis of thorough knowledge of the over-all picture, not in piecemeal bits.

So I urge upon you, as I demand of myself, the need for knowledge for understanding and for strength that we, as a nation, may justify the faith of those who look to us.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HARLESS].

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a very interesting address by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON]. We have heard a great deal today about the national emergency and the international situation, and yet here with a mere brush of the shoulder, we are about to vote on legislation which is possibly going to destroy or seriously cripple one of our most important industries, the copper-mining industry. I want to remind you that this piece of legislation is being considered without giving due consideration to the industry concerned to be heard. This piece of legislation was jerked out of thin air and was voted out of committee without the copper-mining industry of this country being given notice. If you take the tariff off the copper-mining industry in this country for a period of 3 years, your development work in the copper mines will stop. I worked in a copper mine for 5 years, and I know what I am talking about. A company will not spend $50,000,000 or even $100,000 without getting a fair return. Incidentally, $50,000,000 was the amount spent in one mine, the Morenci mine, before the producer took out one cent of profit. No company nor individual will extend himself unless he is guaranteed a fair return on his investment. Now, we are facing a grave world situation. The copper-mining industry suffered throughout this last war because the OPA froze the price of copper at 12 cents a pound. Now that the ceiling has been taken off, the industry is beginning to strive again. We cannot depend upon a source of copper from the South American countries or Africa to support our national defense and to protect us in time of an emergency.

I was very much surprised to see that this bill was reported out in its present form to extend the moratorium until 1950. I have no doubt but what this rule will pass, but there will be some amendments offered, and I say that 2 years or until 1949, is too long under present conditions, because if you want a healthy mining industry you cannot count on a shortage to last for more than 1 year. That was testified to by Mr. Hayes, the only real authority that testified before the committee. As a matter of fact, the Congressman from the different copper-mining States concerned in this matter were not really notified. We heard about it indirectly and went to the committee and appeared. We were given the courtesy of making a statement.

We contend that the moratorium should not extend beyond June 30, 1948. If the shortage continues when that time arrives, then we can reconsider the matter and provide for an additional extension.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HALLECK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand there are 9 minutes remaining on our side to be allotted. I shall not object to this request, but there are two or three other matters we hope to dispose of this afternoon and I shall, except for this subsequent allotment of time, feel constrained to object to requests to proceed out of order until the business scheduled for consideration in the House has been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I stated in the well of the House:

> The major European problems which afflict us today are the direct products of the secret agreements secretly arrived at during the war. For reasons unknown to the American people and even to those in the State Department who should have known, European spheres of influence were carved out at the major conferences of Russia, Great Britain, and our country. Russia was given control over the whole of central and western Europe. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, and the Balkans were read out of western Europe. Our own country was to be content with its usual idealistic goose egg.
> The chickens are now coming home to roost. We shall pay and pay heavily for the next generation for this foreign policy.

I was greatly concerned when I listened to the President's address this morning and I observed the Members of both Houses as they sat here. The President was received very graciously and with some enthusiasm, but his remarks were treated with grave misgivings. There were very few interruptions by applause. Every Member of this House must feel, as I do, most apprehensive as to what the future has in store for us. The program that is recommended here is a departure from our traditional foreign policy.

While considering what the President has asked us to do, I was thinking of what a member of the Appropriations Committee, an old member, told me in conversation the other night. He said a constituent of his informed him that a group of dealers from Canada purchased surplus property which had been given to Greece by the United States, and made a profit of $12,000,000 by reselling this property to the Russian Government. The gentleman from Massachusetts, our good friend, the minority whip, says that the people are looking to the Capital of the United States or to the Kremlin. I do not know about that. If we in the United States realize and recognize the truth of that statement and if we are selling or giving our surplus property to nations or to dealers who in turn are selling it to the Kremlin, then I say we should call a halt. It is amazing that there is such a conflict of thought and action.

Russia is buying up this property in wholesale lots, on the one hand and on the other hand it is quite obvious that we are asked to help Greece to keep Russia in her place. I am more concerned not by what the President said but what he did not say. We find that all of the truth is not being given to us. Perhaps our leaders know more about this than we do. I am willing to follow them. I am anxious to follow them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'KONSKI].

AN ANSWER TO THE PLEA FOR THE SALVATION OF GREECE

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, the speech by President Truman concerning the necessity for our taking over the affairs of Greece should make every red-blooded American citizen demand that it is time for a rendezvous with destiny.

The speech by President Truman clearly indicates that our national leadership is following the same path of stupidity that our Nation has followed for the past 15 years in international affairs.

The tragedy of Greece is an American tragedy more than it is the tragedy of Greece. The tragedy of Greece is a plain indication that our national leadership has no more idea of which direction it is going now than it had for the past 15 years. The tragedy of Greece is a tragedy of our own making and our own thinking.

From 1933 to 1941, the leadership of our country was crying for the poor Chinese who were being slaughtered by the Japanese. But at the same time our country was feeding scrap iron, gasoline, and money to the Japanese war machine. From 1933 to 1941, our national leadership gave the Japanese war machine more than a billion dollars in cash. In that period our national leadership gave the Japanese more than 8,000,000 tons of steel. In that period, our national leadership gave the Japanese tanks and high octane gasoline to a degree where Japan had enough war materials and money from the United States of America to fight a war against us for 1 year. We paid in blood, sweat, and tears and hundreds and thousands of our boys bled and died in order to protect us from the Japanese war machine which our national leaders encouraged and financed.

From 1933 to 1938 our national leadership gave Germany more than $1,000,000,000 to rebuild its economy. While in America we had bread lines and soup lines, our national leadership was dishing out hundreds of millions of dollars to help the poor and starving German people. While our people were in bread lines and soup lines, with our money Germany built seven large stadiums and the German people accumulated savings of $10,000,000,000. In that period the German people also spent more than $40,000,000,000 on their war machine. The German war machine was built up and encouraged by the national leadership of the United States of America from 1933 to 1938. Hundreds and thousands of our boys bled and died to stop this German war machine from taking over America. This is the war machine that American leadership encouraged and financed. This was done under the guise of stopping communism in Europe.

Then we turn around and we pour $10,000,000,000 into Communist Russia and build them a war machine wherein they are able to take over not only all of the countries surrounding Russia, but all of Balkan, Baltic, and central Europe. With our $10,000,000,000 we made them so strong that they are now threatening the peace of the world. I repeat, it is American money and American capital and American leadership that built the Russian war machine to the point that now they threaten the peace of the world. Again, the leadership of the United States of America has created its own destiny.

Honest and sincere people would think that we should have learned a lesson. However, even after this last war, World War II, we knew no other course except to follow the old course. Since the war ended, our national leadership has poured 650,000,000 of our taxpayers' money into Communist Yugoslavia. With the money that we gave them in the last 2 years, Yugoslavia has built a standing army of 600,000 men. With our money Yugoslavia has the best-dressed and the best-fed army in the world. With our money, Yugoslavia has not only built its own army but it has called in the revolutionists of Greece and trained them in typical Communist tactics. The Yugoslavian Communist Government now is infiltrating those revolutionists into Greece to start a revolution and civil war in Greece. Now we are asked to stop that revolution and civil war in Greece. I repeat, it is American capital and American leadership that built up Communist Yugoslavia and its Communist agents in Greece.

Now comes the sad and tragic end. Now comes the President of the United States of America before the Congress of the United States of America, pleading that we have got to pour hundreds of millions of dollars into Greece in order to save Greece from communism. First, we give $650,000,000 to Communist Yugoslavia to strengthen communism in the Balkans, and now our President asks us to pour in hundreds of millions of dollars in order to stop that which we ourselves created with American capital and with American leadership.

There are those who call this policy American and humanitarian. There are those who say that this is accepting our place of leadership in the world. There are those who call it expediency and appeasement. There are others who call this different sorts of things. But I for one, call our foreign policy the utmost of stupidity. As far as I can see, in the past 14 years we have had only one principle involved in our foreign policy. That principle has been to try to buy a potential enemy with money. With that money we have enabled our potential enemies to build up strength to the point where they threaten the peace of the world. Then along comes the same national leaders who say that we have to dish out additional billions of dollars to stop the threat which we ourselves financed and which we ourselves created. If this kind of policy is not plain stupidness, pray tell me what is it? It is time for a "rendezvous with destiny." The President has told us nothing new. He merely confirmed the conviction that I had a long time ago that the foreign policy of the United States of America is the same stupid and blind foreign policy that this country has carried out in the past 14 years. It seems that the only destiny that our President has indicated for our country is more blood, sweat, and tears. More billions to build up potential enemies. So that there will be more billions poured out to stop the potential enemies. There may be those who call this good business. But to me it is plain stupidness.

If this administration is sincere in its attempt to stop communism—they should start at home. Why fight communism in Greece and at the same time tolerate communism at home? If the President had stated that he is beginning an offensive against communism by discharging Federal employees and by clearing the Communists out of America first I could then go along with him. But why send out millions to Greece to be followed by our boys' blood—only to find that while we are trying to save Greece from communism—they took over our own Nation? I say keep our money and our boys to keep communism out of America. To continue to pour out millions abroad is merely playing the Communist game to bankrupt us and destroy us. We can stop communism in Europe most effectively by refusing to finance it. Thus far our own Nation has been the biggest financier of communism in Europe. It is time we stopped being stupid and played smart for a change.

The Greek tragedy is merely the result of our chickens coming home to roost. To stop communism in Greece we must first stop breeding and producing Communist chickens. This is the common-sense thing to do. But there has been no common sense in our foreign policy for 15 years. Do not expect any for a long time to come. Just dishing out.

If we want to stop communism, how about stopping it at home first? How about stopping communism in South America? How about helping Spain keep communism out of Spain? We have a chance of stopping communism in those places. We have no chance of keeping it out of Greece. We dished out $650,000,000 to finance communism in the Balkans. Two hundred and fifty millions to stop it will not help a bit.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the regular business of the day and any other special orders on Monday, the 17th of March, I may address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include certain excerpts from an address made by Mr. J. Edgar Hoover and an editorial from the New York Journal of Commerce.

Mr. SPRINGER asked and was granted permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LATHAM (at the request of Mr. HALLECK) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE] may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes, and that immediately thereafter the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE] may be permitted to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

IMPORT TAXES ON COPPER

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2404) to suspend certain import taxes on copper.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2404), with Mr. DIRKSEN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take the floor on the measure before us, but in view of the fact that the President appeared before a joint session of the Congress today to inform us of the seriousness of the world situation, I feel that I should say just a word in behalf of the pending bill.

As you all know, there is a very serious copper shortage in the country. It is becoming worse daily. At the time this measure was reported we did not look upon it as a war measure, but I am afraid perhaps this is the first measure to be considered in preparation for "World War No. 3." I hope not, but anyway let me urge upon all of you to support this measure because it really is an emergency measure.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman feel that the passage of this bill, H. R. 2404, would be in the interest of national defense?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I think so; I think so.

Mr. MURDOCK. I take direct issue with my friend in that respect. In the long run this bill would be adverse to our national security.

Mr. KNUTSON. That, of course, is a matter of opinion but the trade said that if this legislation is passed it will greatly facilitate the importation of copper into this country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The evidence submitted to the committee indicated that there was a shortage of copper of all types in this country.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In my opinion anything which puts copper into the hands of our people, the durable and nondurable consumer goods which we need, which we expect and which we demand to guarantee this domestic program so that we can finance the international programs will be in the interest of national defense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly support this measure. As far as I am concerned, I should like to see the date "1950" stricken from the bill in order that our manufacturers who make articles that require copper may understand that they are not going to run into this condition again in 1950.

Here is the predicament we are in today: A large portion of our machinery is coming to a standstill for the want of copper, a strategic material. I know because I have recently written to all the manufacturers of transformers in the United States urging them to speed up the manufacture of transformers in order that we may extend electricity to the farm homes of the country. They tell me they cannot do so because of the lack of strategic materials, and every single one of them, if I remember correctly, mentioned copper.

I should like to see this tax entirely removed and no limitation put on the importation of copper, because, as I said, industries have closed down. When they can start getting copper then we will begin to get the materials and machinery we need. But if they are to understand that they are going to have this tax placed back on them in 1950 it may deter them from going into business at all.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] said a moment ago that copper was a strategic material or defense material; that is true. You cannot run any kind of machinery without copper.

I appreciate the attitude of the gentlemen from those States where copper is produced, but the truth is they are not producing enough copper to supply the demands, and the rest of the country cannot stop, close down, and wait for a supply to be built up. Unless something of this kind is done we are not going to have enough copper to do business with. I am not so sure that this is going to bring the relief needed, for the simple reason that unfortunately goods are bringing more in American money in foreign countries than they are in the United States in a great many instances. I know a good deal of that was due to OPA, to the price-fixing policy. We fixed the price of sugar and everybody wondered why they could not get sugar. On looking around we found that they got higher prices in American dollars for sugar in foreign countries than they did in the United States, and the sugar refiners were making it and shipping it to other nations.

So I suggest, and I hope it will be carried out, that the date "1950" will be stricken from the bill.

I want to again appeal to the Committee on Banking and Currency to look into the operation of the Federal Reserve System and protect us from any further financial inflation while at the same time prices are being held down at home to the detriment of the American people.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not think we should blame the Federal Reserve System so much. The policy of the Treasury, the policy of this Government, too, is for the commercial banks of this country to purchase Treasury issues in order to finance these various things, and I think therein lies inflation.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that, but it comes through the Federal Reserve Board, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not know anything of the kind, because I know that the banks have absorbed $150,000,000,000 in bonds.

Mr. RANKIN. I will show the gentleman if I have the time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am just as familiar with the situation as the gentleman is.

Mr. RANKIN. You will see that we have $25,000,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes out, and they are increasing every month.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And so are the bonds held by the commercial banks.

Mr. RANKIN. When the Federal Reserve System holds and issues money to anybody who is willing to buy bonds it increases inflation. Let me tell the gentleman something else. In 1920 there were $6,000,000,000 in circulation. Today we have $28,950,000,000 in circulation. I say the Committee on Banking and Currency better look into it and check this inflation of the currency before it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, there is no question but what the United States of America and its entire industrial system is in a critical condition for want of copper. Of course, there is a reason for that. In the first place, prior to the war and beginning about 1935, we started shipping copper to Japan until we finally shipped that country 350,000 tons, which would have carried us for some time. Then we found ourselves in desperation to get the necessary copper in order to prepare for war. It finally comes down to the time where, after this message today, there is not a man on the floor of this House who feels too certain as to what the future is going to bring forth. In view of that message, and in view of the situation that has developed in the industries of this country for want of copper, we need all the copper we can get for months to come from every mine in the world. The difficulty will be to procure it.

There was a stock of 500,000 tons under control of the Metals Reserve, but gradually that has been whittled down now until there is supposed to be just about 55,000 tons, which is being allocated now at such a rate that it will not keep our industries going but a few months hence; so the necessity for this bill.

I think it should be limited to the period provided in the bill, but others may think it should be limited for a less time. At any rate, one thing is absolutely certain, and that is that the domestic mines of the country cannot produce the copper necessary for the industries of our Nation to function during several years to come. In the first place, they cannot develop the new lodes of ore in their mines that were reduced to a low level of production because much of the mining labor was drafted into the Army. Now we have got to wait until such time as they can develop these new lodes and start in producing in larger quantities. That perhaps they can do within the time limit in this bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. There is another sad fact, too. No agency of the Government is making any effort to establish any stock pile because they have not anything to establish it with.

Mr. REED of New York. No person can possibly know how much copper we are going to get as a result of eliminating this 4 cents a pound or $80 a ton from the price, but at the world price and the present domestic price, naturally the copper from South America and the other foreign mines is going to go to the markets where they can receive the highest pay. So it is necessary to reduce this tariff in order that whatever foreign copper is available we can get as a result of the reduction of this tariff on copper.

Never, until the message today, was it more important to have our industries ready to function and to have a stock pile for future eventualities, than right now. So, I urge upon this Congress at this critical time to support this bill, and that we begin to lay in a stock pile so that our industries can begin to build it up. Copper is not only needed for consumption goods in this country, but even in the cities you will find them operating their electric plants without an adequate supply. There is a company in one of my cities that uses more copper than any other municipal plant in the State of New York, and they only have a short supply ahead; they cannot get new transformers, which require copper. So, the word comes in from all parts of the country that copper is needed. Now, after the President's message, I say again that this situation is critical, and that we should start the flow of copper, if it can be obtained, into this country, so that we can function as a Nation both in peace as well as in war. Talk about inflation. One of the ways to solve inflation, of course, is to stop pushing the currency in circulation, which we are doing now, to the tune of about $162,000,000,000, when we figure in credit currency. The most important thing today is to create consumer goods in such quantities that the people will not be bidding against each other for them. So I consider this bill a major bill of importance, and I hope that there will not be one vote against it when the time to vote comes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from New York that this is a very important bill. I agree with the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means and with the authors of the two bills heard by that committee that there is an extreme shortage in the copper industry, and that that shortage must be supplied at the first opportunity.

However, I do not agree with the idea that a 3-year suspension of the 4-cent excise tax should be put into effect, because, unlike any other Representative in this House, I am in the position where the biggest producer in my area not only produces copper domestically but imports from South America as well. I come from Butte, the biggest mining camp on the face of the globe, and in that camp is the richest hill on earth. We have produced almost $3,000,000,000 worth of copper ore during our history. If you are willing to remove this copper excise tax for 3 years, and maybe longer, you are willing to help sound the death knell to towns like Butte and Anaconda, which depend on the mines and the mines only. What you are doing in effect is putting a prohibition upon American high-cost producers like Butte and giving an added advantage to low-cost producers like those in Chile, Peru, Rhodesia, Katanga, Canada, and elsewhere. If this Congress takes away the protection that we need, I can tell you right now that Butte and Anaconda will become ghost towns.

The cost of copper since the first of November has risen from 12 to 21½ cents. What encouragement do you think is needed for these copper importers on the basis of that kind of a price rise within a 6 months' period? Surely the lifting of this 4-cent excise tax is not going, in my opinion, to bring in much more in the way of copper poundage, but I am willing to be reasonable, in view of the situation as it exists at this time, to give this matter a trial. I am opposed to a 3-year suspension. I intend to support as much as I can the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Colorado, putting the termination date for this suspension at March 31, 1949, instead of March 31, 1950. It was my intention to offer an amendment limiting the time of suspension to 1 year, but in view of what has occurred in this Chamber today I will support my colleague's amendment as the best that we can get.

This country generally produces about 900,000 tons of copper a year. We are short at the present time around 400,000 tons of our yearly needs. It is true that we do not have more than 55,000 tons on hand in this country and therefore an emergency does exist. But I am wondering if some of these copper importers are not holding back to see if this bill will not pass, and then bring in their copper and get away from paying the excise tax. I recall the testimony of the former Senator from Connecticut, a very able gentleman, Mr. Danaher. He appeared before the committee and made the statement, I believe, that an American company had 28,000 tons of copper in bond. If I understand that correctly, that copper is already mined and ready to be brought into this country, but it is not being brought in despite the great emergency which does exist because of the possibility that this 4 cents excise tax will be done away with. I do not think that is the right thing to do. These industries which depend on copper and the farmers who are looking forward to the rural-electrification program and the copper-using industries are entitled to that copper at the earliest opportunity. Certainly the increase in price from 12 to 21½ cents in less than a 6-month period is enough inducement for any producer to bring his copper in and bring it in at a very good profit.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. The world price of copper today is slightly in excess of 22½ cents. The copper price in this country is 21½ cents. In the light of that, is it difficult for the gentleman to understand why that copper stock pile in Chile to which the gentleman refers does not flow to the American market?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Not at all, because if you allow that copper to come in after this bill is passed it will mean that instead of getting 21½ cents on the American market they will be getting 25½ cents, because they can add this excise tax which has been taken off to the price they get for their copper.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this bill to suspend the import tax on copper until March 31, 1950, has many inherent dangers with respect to the copper industry of this country and for that matter to many other industries as well. Looking ahead for a period of 3 years and trying to legislate on specific matters on the assumption that conditions throughout this country and the world will remain fixed and rigid for that period may easily create more problems than it solves. The President's speech this afternoon on the subject of Greece and Turkey is pretty convincing proof of the unsettled condition of world affairs. The production of copper contributes to our natural wealth in time of peace and is of still more vital importance to the defense of our country in time of war.

To take any action which might have the over-all effect of hampering the production of copper on a sound economic basis would be the sheerest folly. Furthermore past experience has shown that foreign copper has invaded an unprotected copper market to a point where it was threatening destruction of an important segment of this great industry. In my district in the Northern Peninsula of Michigan—one of the great copper-producing areas of this country—we know from bitter experience during the last depression, the devastating effect that the importation of low-tariff copper can have on our economy. It virtually wiped out the copper industry in our area and was the direct cause of a prolonged period of unemployment. No one wants that to happen again either in northern Michigan or elsewhere in the country.

Everyone admits that presently there is a serious shortage of copper; but those who assume that this is anything but a temporary condition are ignoring the underlying causes of the shortage. It is equally fallacious to assume that the present shortage will continue for a period of 3 years. Moreover, this assumption is downright dangerous and would actually jeopardize the principles of real conservation and the development of future copper resources.

We must recognize the basic proposition that to be successful and economic the copper-mining business must be a continuing one. It is not the type of enterprise that can be opened and closed at will. In order to survive, it must be maintained as a "going industry" if it is to be an effective instrument of national defense. This is particularly true of an underground mine which can suspend operations without danger of damage only on a very temporary basis because the minute the pumps are stopped and the mine fills with water, reopening becomes an almost impossible task. Furthermore, in order for the copper industry to survive, it must be able to explore and make new developments as the old sources of supply are depleted. The low price of copper since 1931 has discouraged this type of exploration and development. This is another important reason why we should not legislate too far into the future. The copper industry must know where it is going if it is to do its full share in respect to national defense. It must have protection against the importation of cheap copper except on a very temporary basis and until such time as the present emergency has been corrected.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we should not suspend the copper import tax for a longer period than June 30, 1948. If this temporary shortage still exists, we can make a further suspension of the import tax on the basis of facts as they exist a year from today. There is not a Member of this House who can accurately say what our needs will be a year hence—let alone 3 years hence.

I am going to support the amendment to limit the suspension to 2 years because I think it will be some improvement to the bill as reported. Actually, we ought not go beyond June 30, 1948.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, listening to the speech of the President of the United States here today brought home further the fact to me that we need more copper. I hate to think of war. It is deplorable, in my estimation, having been a member of the armed forces in this last conflict. But I just want to quote Secretary of War Patterson, who said that "An army without copper would be an army without speed, maneuverability, fire power, or communication. It would not last one day in battle."

Mr. Chairman, at the present time we do not have copper. In the event of an emergency, which God forbid, we certainly would be in a very weakened condition.

I have heard the remarks of the gentlemen from the West and I appreciate their position. They talk about unemployment. In Connecticut, particularly in my own district, we have great brass mills. One of these employs around 15,000 people. I have been told by the men who are running these factories that if we do not have copper by the end of March, that is, this month, we will have unemployment. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, to insure continued employment of the workingman, not only in my district and the State of Connecticut, but all over the United States I urge the gentlemen of this Congress to give me their support in order that this bill will be passed here in the House.

I do not suppose it is possible for anyone to tell exactly how much copper will be required over the next 3 years. I do not suppose it is possible for anyone to tell exactly how much domestic copper will be produced in the same period. It has reasonably been estimated, however, that our requirements will run around 1,400,000 tons per year, while our production is estimated at about 900,000 tons per year. Obviously, we will be short 500,000 tons per year and that deficit can only be made up by imports. I know that the gentlemen from the West claim that my bill will affect the mining production in this country. In my opinion, it will not. I personally would withdraw my bill immediately if I thought for one moment that the American mines could meet the demands of the present day.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield to the majority leader, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. I believe it should appear in the RECORD in connection with the gentleman's remarks that the gentleman from Connecticut, who is one of the new Members in the House of Representatives, is making a great record of accomplishment here, as evidenced by the fact that he is the author of the pending bill. I commend him for the eminent fairness with which he approached this very difficult situation and especially commend him for his farsighted good judgment in recognizing quite some time ago the very critical situation confronting the whole country by reason of the copper shortage, and moving to do something about it on his own initiative.

My information is that the very considerable stock pile of copper which had been accumulated by the Government, and which was in existence something like a year ago, has been almost used up in an effort to supply our domestic needs until it now seems that very shortly, unless something is done, we shall be without any such stock pile.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is correct, and I want to thank the majority leader, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Can the gentleman tell us at the present time what the domestic market price of copper is?

Mr. PATTERSON. At the present time, it is 21½ cents.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is the open foreign market price, roughly?

Mr. PATTERSON. I believe it is 22.85 cents.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What causes that difference? Who sets the market price here? Is the Government buying our copper at the present time? Why is this market lower than the other market?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to only ask the indulgence of the House briefly in support of the pending bill, hoping that as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means I may be able to give some information that will be helpful in the consideration of this measure, H. R. 2404. As has been stated by other members of the Committee on Ways and Means who have preceded me, this measure was unanimously reported by the committee. It is here for the purpose of relieving a very acute shortage of copper in this country.

Prior to the recent war, this country was about self-sufficient in copper. We produced approximately the amount of copper that we needed or consumed. During the war, a stock pile of copper was built up by the Government, and at the close of the war, as I now remember the figure, we had about 655,000 tons in the possession of the Metal Reserves Corporation of the RFC; that is, Government copper. During the year 1946 we produced in this country about 604,000 tons, which was about one-half of the amount we consumed.

In the year 1947 it is estimated we will produce about 950,000 tons and that we will need about 1,400,000 tons, the result being that we will have a shortage of about 450,000 tons of copper during this year. Of the 655,000 tons that we had in the stock pile at the end of the war, about 600,000 tons have already been used and as of the 1st of March we had only about 55,000 tons left in the stock pile. The estimate was that we would use about 40,000 tons of that during the month of March. So that early in April we will be out of any copper in the stock pile, because about April 1 we will have only about 15,000 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GRANGER. I think the gentleman ought to be fair.

Mr. COOPER. I am trying to be fair.

Mr. GRANGER. The gentleman well knows that every copper mine in the West was closed for 4 months during the last year. Of course they were not producing copper.

Mr. COOPER. I have not said anything about whether they were closed or open. I am talking about what copper we have in the country and the need for this legislation, as it was presented to our committee. That is all I am trying to do. I am trying to convey to the House the information that was presented to the committee during the hearings held on this bill. It certainly is well recognized by everybody that copper is one of the most essential of the materials we have to use in this country. It is thought, by all of those who are in a position to know about the situation, that this legislation is badly needed.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The most optimistic claim on the part of those speaking for the copper producers was that we would produce locally 950,000 tons next year.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct. I think the most optimistic estimate was 950,000 tons. Some of those in a position to know as much about it as anybody, said that was probably 100,000 tons more than would be produced. But that is giving the benefit of the highest estimate given to the committee. Even if we do get production of 950,000 tons, according to the estimated consumption we will be about 450,000 tons short. So this bill is here only for the purpose of trying to meet the critical need of a material that is vital.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FOOTE].

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to speak here for a few minutes today in support of the bill introduced by my neighbor and good friend, JIM PATTERSON. The problems that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON] has in his district are a great deal like mine. We have manufacturing concerns in our districts which use copper. It is their principal raw material. Within the last month I have received letters and telegrams from various concerns in my district calling attention to the very serious situation with which they are confronted and which has a vital effect upon the production of the country at large, in my opinion. Why do I say that? I have before me a letter received from the Rockbestos Products Corp., of New Haven. That company is engaged in the manufacture of insulated electric wires and cables. Its principal raw material is copper, and its entire operation is dependent upon copper supply. The president of the company states that a slow-down in the wire and cable industry would cause layoffs in the electrical manufacturing industry from toasters to Diesel locomotives, as well as in the automotive and other industries that must have wire and cable to keep their people employed.

A similar plea for action has been received by me from the G. & O. Manufacturing Co., of New Haven, who manufacture radiators, and likewise from the Cuneo Engineering Corp., of Meriden, manufacturers of filters and electrical automotive equipment.

I trust that this bill will be given approval by the Congress.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SADLAK].

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Chairman, the primary question before us today concerns the shortage of raw copper. The secondary question is our recourse under the circumstances.

My distinguished colleague from the land of steady habits, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON] has proposed a measure and means of coping with the pressing situation of this critical shortage. He has taken cognizance of the importance of this shortage to the manufacturers of his district in the State of Connecticut, and to the major manufacturers throughout the Nation. He has also talked about the effect on the great many people who are employed in these industries.

In view of the vital message we heard delivered by the President earlier today, it seems to me we ought to take measures immediately for the replenishment of the depleted stock of this raw copper. Transformers have been mentioned as one important item greatly in need for which copper is lacking. There are many necessities requiring copper—mentioning a few such as housing for veterans, refrigerators, appliances and so forth.

I wish at this time to join the commendation that our majority leader made and say that, in view of the message we heard this afternoon, the proposal by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON] indicates unassailable good sense.

The bill H. R. 2404 was unanimously reported by the committee. I urge that each Member vote in accordance with the committee's recommendations.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may desire to the gentlewoman from New Mexico [Mrs. LUSK].

Mrs. LUSK. Mr. Chairman, at the time we are thinking of a copper shortage in this country, I want to call attention to the plight of the copper-mining industry in New Mexico. Copper mining is one of our largest industries. It is carried on not only by large companies but by many small companies.

It is my opinion at this time that due to high production costs these small companies will not be able to continue their work and their business if this bill is passed today and I think that some consideration is due to the workers in those mines, and the small operators as well as to the large operators.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New Mexico has consumed 1 minute.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LOVE].

Mr. LOVE. Mr. Chairman, there is a serious copper shortage in our country today. The domestic supply is inadequate. I shall support this bill to suspend the import tax on copper, and I urge my colleagues to support it likewise.

Copper is essential to the manufacture of many industrial products. Finished steel products depend entirely on electrical equipment in which copper is most important. Because of the copper shortage the production of steel is being greatly curtailed, and production in general is being retarded. Unemployment is resulting from the scarcity of this essential metal. Many industries are planning great expansion programs to promote a greater prosperity and provide the regular employment of many more people.

These expansion programs cannot proceed until we are able to secure an adequate supply of copper necessary for the manufacture of electrical equipment and steel products necessary for the great expansion programs of our industries.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, the passage of H. R. 2404 is of vital importance to hundreds of American manufacturers. We need every ton of copper that can be produced anywhere in the world. We need copper for our depleted stock pile. We need it for the building of badly needed homes.

My colleague the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON] should be complimented for the energy he has shown in bringing this bill to the attention of the Congress and the country. As a freshman in the House he has demonstrated ability to act for the benefit of his district and his country. I hope that H. R. 2404 is but the first of many bills my colleague will guide through the Congress. I, too, actively support this bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, let us face a clear situation in regard to this bill. The major part of the opposition before the committee I find came from the Democrats, although today a few of my colleagues from the West on the Republican side are pointing out the dangers in it. Yet this bill by virtually repealing a tariff duty does violence to all the traditional Republican policies with regard to tariffs and protection.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Briefly.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. I think the RECORD ought to be clear on this point. Under the tariff act of 1930, copper was on the free list. Many items containing copper were dutiable. Those items are not affected by this legislation one bit insofar as that tariff levy of 1930 is concerned, subject, however, to such reciprocal trade agreements as affect it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think that makes it clear. Yes; this is an excise duty; it is not a tariff duty. However, it is the equivalent of a tariff duty with the principle of protection back of it.

I want to call the attention of the Republican Members of this House to the general effect of this bill as contrary to their policy. I notice that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] took the floor here in support of the bill, saying that he, as the great advocate of rural electrification, wants to get copper into the country so that we may have transformers and all that sort of thing. I want to assure the country that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] alone outranks me in this body in interest in rural electrification. I, too, represent consumers. My people want automobiles, refrigerators, and everything that requires copper in their composition. My own son at this very minute is trying to build a home out in Arizona. He needs electrical equipment for that house. Although a veteran, he is having trouble getting it. His partner, also with veteran's preference, is having the same difficulty. Of course, I want more goods made of copper. But we better not run the risk of wrecking a defense industry such as the domestic production of copper in order that we may get a little cheaper copper for domestic consumption.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] took the floor here and said he favored this bill as a matter of national defense. I cannot see how he figures that way. To me that looks like a short-sighted policy. Are we going to take the long-run or short-run view? If we repeal or if we suspend this duty for 3 years, and that is equivalent to repeal, this 4-cent-per-pound duty on foreign copper, it may have the effect of making it easier to bring in foreign copper. But there is a shortage in foreign production also. I tell you that even if we repeal this 4-cent duty, you will not bring out of the ground 1 pound of copper because of this act. But you will endanger the production of copper in this country.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Briefly.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Is it not a fact that right now the Metal Reserves Corporation can go out and buy copper anywhere in the world and bring it in here and that all this will do is to make it possible for the manufacturer to get the copper for 4 cents less a pound than he would otherwise be able to?

Mr. MURDOCK. That is correct. Now, we better pay a little more for what we get in the way of the finished product rather than run this risk to a vital defense industry. This bill is not a matter of national defense. If we want a stock pile we can get the copper now as we got it during wartime, bring it in without any duty. That is what I recommend. We should do that concurrently with full encouragement of domestic production.

Here is the proposition: We pay 4 cents more a pound under the present law and that adds to the cost of the finished product. It is a short-range view, gentlemen, that we are taking here in order to cheapen our much-needed postwar production. Do let us be careful.

In 1937 and 1938 I pleaded with certain Members on the majority side, for God's sake let us get a reserve, for national defense, of strategic and critical materials, getting what we must abroad and at the same time developing our home supply, and yet I found Members on my own side of the aisle who said that we must get all of it abroad, and we were caught short at the beginning of a global war. What a short-range policy, instead of increasing our domestic production. Such was national defense in reverse order and this proposal is similar to it.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, the mining industry of Nevada has always favored an import tax on copper as a protection of that vital mining industry in the State. I am opposed to the suspension of the import tax on copper of 4 cents for 3 years at this time or any other time.

While it is true that domestic production of copper does not now equal consumption, and that this condition will probably continue this year, we do not definitely know that this condition will extend over a period of 3 years. If such a suspension of the import tax on copper is to be made, I would rather have it extended for 1 year, and no more.

War conditions brought about the greater use of copper for materials of war, and copper production in the United States dropped last year 240,000 short tons below the 1945 production figure, all this contributing to cause the present shortage of copper. Yet but a relatively few years ago under normal conditions our domestic production of copper was adequate for our consumption, and under normal conditions again this probably will be the case.

What mining needs in this Nation now is stimulation for the development of new ore bodies and the development of marginal ores of not only copper but of other metals and minerals which the Nation critically needs. We need stimulation for the building up of our own natural resources, rather than to jeopardize mining through the importation in the future of copper or any other metal or mineral which can be produced more cheaply in foreign countries at the expense of our own mining industry.

Any suspension of the import tax on copper for 3 years might lead toward the end of the suspension period to the importation of copper at a much lower price than it could then be produced domestically.

The copper-mining industry employs many thousands of men at high wages, as compared to the cheap wages paid in other nations, and the import tax on copper is for their protection, as well as for the protection of the copper industry.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, 8 years ago I had quite an interesting experience in assisting with the passage of Public Act 117 of the Seventy-sixth Congress. That was the first legislation authorizing the stock piling of strategic and critical materials for national defense. I did considerable work at that time with the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] and some other Members who represent copper districts, in considering the critical item of copper. We went into the last war without any adequate stock pile of copper, and we know that we sweated blood throughout the war and did everything humanly possible toward getting a sufficient stock pile of copper and other critical materials in preparation for that emergency. In 1946, the evidence in the hearing shows 657,000 tons of the reserve of copper in this country was turned into domestic and civilian consumption, and so far as I can make out there has been no effective move in the direction of establishing a stock pile for national defense. Now, until we get that stock pile for national defense I am going to be very critical of any move that will thwart or stifle our efforts toward attaining that goal. Just last summer I worked with the gentlemen from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK and Mr. HARLESS] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. GRANGER], in the matter of the bill, S. 752, and you will recall we had some real difficulty in keeping the buy-American clause in there, and also striking out the free import provision that was put in by the Senate. I give that information as evidence that I have real regard for American industry. However, our national defense needs are so desperate and so immediately at hand today that the copper producers should bear with us and support the bill now before the House. We have got to get this stock pile for national defense. That is a must, and today's appearance of the President on the floor of this House has not lessened my concern one iota in that regard. For 8 years I worked on the Committee on Military Affairs in this field. Eight years ago I had the privilege of serving on the committee of conference between the House and the Senate in building the first authorization for stock piling our strategic and critical materials, Public Law 117 of the Seventy-sixth Congress. From that day to this I have made it a point to follow our progress as a Nation in building those stock piles for national defense. I am not satisfied with the stock-pile program to date and the bill, H. R. 2404, is badly needed to help build up our reserves of copper as quickly as possible.

In the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on this bill, I asked the question of some of the witnesses, including the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HARLESS], whether he thought we could get the necessary national defense stock pile in 15 months, if the time limit of this bill were so fixed as he advocated; and he told me he could not guarantee it. I agree with the gentleman that we cannot expect the acquisition of an adequate stock pile in 15 months. For that reason I favor the passage of the bill, H. R. 2404, now before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support this bill. I come from a community which all my colleagues probably would be willing to concede is the finest industrial city in the country, Rochester, N. Y. No dissent is audible. It is a community of many diversified industries, and with reference to this bill I have had more urgent telegrams and telephone calls and letters than on any other bill which has been before the House to date.

These messages come from large industries and small, from two or three of our very largest industries and from many small and medium sized concerns. Of course, we do not know exactly what effect the passage of this legislation will have in increasing the supplies of copper but we are hopeful that it will have a very good effect along those lines. These urgent messages from business executives who do not go off half-cocked, men who keep their heads on their shoulders and are not panicked into extreme positions, men upon whom the greatest reliance can be placed, inform me that unless something is done immediately, meaning by that in this month or not later than next month, to increase the supplies of copper substantially, there will be closed factories or seriously curtailed operations with thousands of people walking the streets for want of a job. They must have this copper at once.

That is only the industrial side of the picture. We have sat here today and listened to the President detail some of the unsettled conditions in the world. We cannot close our eyes to the additional need for augmenting in every way possible our supplies of this strategic material which is now being channeled elsewhere by reason of our existing prohibitive import duty. National security, as well as domestic prosperity and full employment, cry out for passage of this measure.

I am confident this bill will not seriously affect domestic copper companies. We can use in this country during the next 2 to 3 years, all the copper from all the sources which are available, both domestic and foreign. I urge very strongly the passage of this legislation.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, the issue before us today seems to be quite clear. It is not one of concern on the part of any as to whether there is too much copper available or too little, all appearing to agree that there is an urgent need in the United States for additional copper. The issue before you is the one that was before the committee a few days ago when we were considering this matter, namely, for how long a period of time will it be safe or will it be advisable for the Congress to suspend the import tax on copper.

Our friends from the States producing copper made their appearance before the committee and urged that we limit that period of suspension to June 30, 1948. It is also true that one of the individuals representing the Government suggested that we might well end the suspension period on June 30, 1948, but it was clear in his mind, as it was clear in the minds of the members of the committee, that if we suspended the import tax for a period of 1 year the committee would be back before the Congress, sometime prior to June 30, 1948, asking you again to suspend the import tax on copper and ore concentrates for another period of time, possibly 1 or 2 years.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. If I understand correctly what the gentleman is saying, there is no assurance that the suspension for 1 year would bring about a meeting of the shortage.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman anticipates me. I was coming to that point.

The committee was informed that probably the copper produced in Chile for the next few months would not be available to the United States, that copper having been contracted for some time ago, so that if the Congress merely suspends the import tax on copper for a period of 1 year we would have no assurance whatsoever that we would obtain any material quantity of copper from Chile.

The reason the committee, in my opinion, decided on the longer period of suspension is that if we suspend the import tax for a period of 2 or 3 years the people who process copper into copper goods will have some degree of assurance as to what the situation will be—enough assurance that they can go into Chile and deal with the producers of copper ore on the basis of their needs 1, 2, and 3 years ahead; whereas if we only suspend this import tax for 1 year they will not be in that position.

I have great sympathy for the plight of my friends from the Western States. None of us desires to do anything in Congress to destroy the great copper industry. Those Government witnesses, however, who came before the committee from the CPA, the Tariff Commission, and the Bureau of Mines all advised us that there would be a demand in the United States, all things being equal, of at least 1,400,000 tons of copper next year, the year after, and the year after that possibly, and that the production in the United States could not be in excess of 950,000 tons for any one of those 3 years. That being true, then all of the copper produced in Chile per year, which I understand is something like 600,000 tons, still would not equal the demands that we would have from our civilians for copper goods and also permit the Government to buy some copper during the period of the next 3 years to stockpile against any future emergency, as the gentleman from Iowa and many others of us desire.

It seems that the legislation before us does afford us the first opportunity we have had to permit the Federal Government, through the Army and Navy Munitions Board to obtain copper for stock-piling purposes. Certainly, your mines in Arizona and New Mexico under the legislation passed with your assistance last year, if they do not find an outlet in the civilian market, will find that market by coming to the Federal Government and the Army and Navy Munitions Board.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. At a price which will be the world market price. Is that not true?

Mr. MILLS. The world market price now is higher than our market price. It is 22½ cents or 22.85 cents as against 21½ cents.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Is it not true that every witness who came before the committee said that it was impossible to predict what world conditions would be for more than one year?

Mr. MILLS. Except that in view of the fact that there is such a tremendous shortage of copper in the world, none of them felt that the supply of copper in the world markets would equal world demands within a reasonable period—certainly not within a year or 2 years.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Provided, however, the world manufacturing conditions remain the same a year from now as they are today.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly; if we have a depression, we probably could not use over 600,000 tons of copper.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. The fact remains that the entire committee heard all of the evidence and came to the conclusion unanimously that this bill as written should be reported out.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman is correct. I was one of those who in the beginning considered the matter from the viewpoint of a suspension of 1 year.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. Concerning the evidence furnished, is it not true that these were closed hearings and that not more than three or four Members appeared in opposition and that the copper mining industry itself did not appear, or rather had no chance to appear, in opposition to the bill?

Mr. MILLS. The members of the committee felt that the gentleman from Arizona now interrogating me was fully able to take care of the industry. It is because of your concern, along with others from copper producing districts, that acceptance of an amendment for a 2-year suspension is being considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRANT].

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made on more than one occasion during this debate that inadequate hearings were held on this question of the urgency of the copper shortage in this country. The Ways and Means Committee has in its files some 200 communications from the industry, from producers to the small fabricators from all over this country, attesting to the urgent need for some relief in the copper situation.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. Just to make myself clear on this, not that I am contending there was not sufficient evidence of a shortage of copper; all admit that; but my suggestion is that the hearings were not broad enough to include the copper producers so that they could show the effect of any suspension upon the industry.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. I can only say to the gentleman in reply that a very large copper-producing company, one of the three largest in the world, from the State which the gentleman so well represents, filed a brief before the committee on reciprocity information of the Tariff Commission, acknowledging the serious shortage in the copper situation and saying that some action must be taken, and now, to meet the situation that exists in this country.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Did you give an opportunity to those people to show how long it would take them to meet the demand? That is the question. We admit there is a shortage of copper, but the question is how long you should suspend this and what it will do to the industry.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. As has been stated, I think the industry was very well represented by the two gentlemen who have just interrogated me.

There are a couple of facts about this picture that have not been brought out that I should like to bring out at this time. The first is that about three-quarters of the copper production of this country comes from three large companies—Anaconda, Kennecott, and Phelps-Dodge. Of the other one-quarter of our domestic production, most of it is subsidized by the American taxpayer today to encourage the construction of homes in America and to meet the requirements of the rest of our domestic industry. We just heard the gracious lady from New Mexico speak about these high-cost producers, and the fact that we should be giving some concern to the men who work in those high-cost producing mines. Well, bless your heart, the future of those high-cost mines does not depend on this bill before us today, whether it is voted up or down. The future of those high-cost producing mines is more dependent upon the continuance of the premium-payment plan, the authority for which stems from the Price Control Act which expires on the 30th of next June. The future of those companies depends on what we do on the continuation of those subsidy payments. It has nothing whatsoever to do with the question we have before us today.

Another thing: One of the gentlemen from Arizona, Mr. MURDOCK, I believe, said why could not our taxpayers pay the additional $80 a ton and bring it in over that excise tax wall, and thereby build up the stock pile that is so sorely needed and supplement the supply available to domestic industry. I will tell you why.

If we import 500,000 tons of copper on which the $80 per ton tax is added, that higher figure then becomes the price for all copper in the United States.

Therefore we cannot figure merely the tax on our imported copper, but we must consider the added cost to all the copper industry of the United States, and, in the final analysis, the cost to the American consumer.

May I refer you to the letter from C. E. Wilson, president of General Electric, which appears at page 78 of the printed hearings. Mr. Wilson stated that payment of the 4-cent excise tax would place an additional burden of $120,000,000 annually on the American consumer, based on present consumption.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of the time, 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to alleviate the acute shortage of copper in the United States. Our committee went into this matter very thoroughly. We had witnesses from the Treasury Department, from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, from the Bureau of Mines, from the Tariff Commission, and from the Civilian Production Administration. They were all of one mind and in accord, and testified that there was an acute shortage of copper in this country, which is essential to our national building program.

This bill was reported unanimously by our committee, after most thorough hearings and consideration. It has been stated that those who opposed the bill in the shape in which it was brought out, especially the copper mining industry of this country, were not given any hearing.

I am glad to say that Members of Congress from that section, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK], and other House Members appeared before our committee and discussed the subject fully and presented the side of the copper producing section of this country fully and ably.

Our committee went into this proposal thoroughly and with an open mind and as a result of our deliberations, I repeat, we reported this bill unanimously.

Nothing can demonstrate more clearly and convincingly that there is an acute shortage of this vital material than the fact that the national building program during this reconstruction period is being crippled on account of the shortage of this very vital and necessary material.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the bill introduced by my colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON]. I, too, am a veteran. I think it is quite obvious that a shortage of copper does exist. I know there is a serious shortage of copper that is not being met because the district I have the honor of representing has one town in it, Evansville, Ind., where two of the largest manufacturers of refrigerators in the world have their factories. They will be closed and 11,300 people, my constituents, will be out of work in 30 days if we do not get this copper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill.

I believe in this program for a number of very definite reasons. In the first place, I come from a district which made an enormous contribution industrially to the war but which now is threatened with a very serious copper shortage, particularly in the city of Bridgeport, in the city of Stamford, and also in Shelton and Norwalk, and in other cities in my district there will be widespread unemployment if this copper is not forthcoming.

I believe the people of this country have a right to buy copper-made goods. I believe that we must think first and foremost of the American customer. I also feel that in this perilous time we cannot handicap ourselves with respect to our foreign policy by a shortage of copper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired; all time has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the import tax imposed under section 3425 of the Internal Revenue Code shall not apply with respect to articles entered for consumption or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption during the period beginning with the day following the date of the enactment of this act and ending with the close of March 31, 1950.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROCKWELL: On page 1, line 8, strike out "1950" and insert "1949."

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, for the past hour I have listened to the discussion of this bill. It does not seem to me that we are very far apart. The gentleman on my right and the gentleman on my left who represent areas where copper is produced are worried only about the future of our industry as far as it affects raw materials.

There seems to be no question but that there is a great shortage of copper in this country. The present question is, Can we in 1 or 2 years speed up our domestic production so that we may by that time produce the amount of copper desired? As has been stated here by one of the Members, during the past year the production of copper has upped in the United States from 600,000 tons to 900,000 tons. Day before yesterday I spoke with one of the large producers from the mines of Colorado, and he told me that they had not been able to do the exploration work that was necessary during the past few years. He said it was his opinion there was no question but what we could produce any amount of copper needed if we had the exploration work done.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. I want the gentleman to know that I am in wholehearted accord with his amendment. But I think it also should be brought out that as far as we are concerned, those of us who come from the copper-producing areas, we realize that a delicate situation exists and we want to cooperate to the fullest extent. In my opinion, about 2 years is the limit.

The gentleman has mentioned something about cost. I have some figures here showing that in the United States it cost between 12½ and 16 cents to produce 1 pound of copper. In Chile it cost 6.3; in Canada it cost absolutely nothing. Copper is all clear profit because it is a byproduct of silver and gold. In the Belgian Congo it cost 6½ cents. Now, that is what we have to consider in this proposition. Our costs are so high, averaging from 12½ to 16 cents.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I think that is the point at issue. It is the question of production at home and abroad. I do not believe that anybody on the Republican side of the aisle wishes to harm the domestic copper industry.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Some of us might express the hope that certain gentlemen on the other side of the aisle who have become such keen advocates of tariff protection to industry will be a little more consistent. They apparently raise their voices only when the products in their own districts are involved.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered is an amendment to give the men of the West the opportunity to find out in 2 years if they can produce the amount of copper needed. At the end of that time we can review the situation. That is all my amendment does.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am in support of the gentleman's amendment. Is it not true that the mining industry is of such a nature that you cannot turn on and off production as you would water at the spigot or faucet, and is it not true also that it is a false philosophy that this country has become a have-not Nation with regard to copper? Certainly we have the copper in the ground if we will only keep it in production.

Mr. ROCKWELL. The gentleman is right. When the mines are shut down and are filled with water it costs many millions of dollars to open them again.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. That is true not only with reference to producing copper but in giving it away to all the nations of the earth. May I say to the gentleman in a spirit of harmony and to facilitate matters that I am perfectly willing, and I think I speak the sentiment on this side of the House, to accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the Members of this House from the copper-producing areas of the country should be pleased with the passage of this bill as it is indicative of a protection to their industries in the years ahead. During the war the imposition of the import tax was lifted. Congress is now given the opportunity of lifting that tax permanently, letting you go into the future without any tariff protection, or giving you a suspension and a certainty that when this year or 2-year period is up you will again have the protection which your industry needs. The House is today passing this bill, and if the other body agrees to the legislation, it will mean that we are saying there must be protection afforded the domestic copper industry. You can say at home that Congress has reaffirmed its intention and determination that there shall be a tariff protection given to the copper-producing States. But there is one condition. Right now, today, a branch of our Government under the State Department is offering a country to give up in the forthcoming reciprocal trade agreements some of that protection you now have.

I respectfully suggest to you gentlemen who are interested in protecting the copper-producing areas of our country that you register your objections strenuously with the State Department. Let them know that you do not want that tariff cut. Let them know that Congress today, in passing this legislation, is reaffirming its position that the reciprocal trade agreements must not cut the protection that your industry needs.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have already registered my protest along just that line.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I earnestly hope that when other parts of this great country of ours are threatened through a policy such as that followed by the reciprocal trade agreements group, that those Members will see fit to come to our rescue and help us retain our tariff protection.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I did not think it would ever be necessary for me to engage in debate with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], or the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], on the question of a tariff or that which means the same thing. It seems to me that everyone is pretty well set in their views that this bill should pass, and I believe it is possible for you to beat us with the second team. Even though you have accepted this amendment, it does not satisfy me, and if I have an opportunity to vote on this question, I will still vote against it. I think if the miners and the small operators in the mining areas knew what was being done to them today, there would be a different attitude on the part of the Members of the House. I am confident if you put this exemption into effect for 1 year or 2 years, you will put little copper mines in the country out of business. I am satisfied that is what will happen. You know, gentlemen, you cannot go into the mining business—in and out like you change your socks.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRANGER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If in a year from now the gentleman can show that that is the condition in this country, that the little producers are going out of business, and the gentleman will join me in organizing the battle, we will repeal this act so that that will not happen.

Mr. GRANGER. I will say to the gentleman I have joined with him before on this issue, and I am not running away from it now, because I believe it is just as true now as it was when we were fighting the battle before. While I am glad that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado is accepted, it certainly is not satisfactory to the people who represent these small mines in the various States. I hope when this bill goes to another body for consideration that a reduction to 1 year only will be agreed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time to ask two or three questions about this bill. In the first place I should like to ask someone on the committee—I do not care who it is that answers the question—what causes the difference between the domestic price of copper and the so-called open-market world price of copper today? Who cares to answer that question?

Mr. REED of New York. I would be under great obligation to the gentleman from Tennessee, who is one of the greatest authorities in the House, to give that information.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wonder if the gentleman from Tennessee has any information on that? What causes the difference between the domestic price of copper, which is stated to be somewhere around 21.5 cents and the open-market world price of 22.85, I believe it was? The lack of information leads me to fear there is more or less market manipulation in the copper market at this particular time.

Nobody seems to want to answer it. There must be a fundamental reason for the difference in price if it does exist.

May I ask this question: It has been stated here that our Government has a stock pile of copper which it has been unloading in the market. Has that copper which the Government was selling been unloaded on this market at a price below the world market? Can anybody answer that? The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS] says, "Yes."

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. I understand there have been no sales below the world market. As a matter of fact, they cannot sell it right now because they paid 17 cents. They paid a cent above the world market.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is not what I am getting at. You have a fundamental marketing question here. I think if we could smoke it out we would learn something.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. They have not unloaded any copper purchased on the world market below the world market. They could not unload that now because they bought it at 17. They would have to sell it at a loss.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not want to get into details, but it has been stated here that our market is 21½ cents against a world market of 22.85. That has been stated by members of the committee. Is that true or not?

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. GRANGER. I do not think the committee went into that matter at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am talking about the testimony here this afternoon.

Mr. REED of New York. If the gentleman will yield, as a matter of fact the British have fixed the price on that, and our wartime agencies have fixed the price here.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If our Government owns copper which it is selling to the trade, and the Government is offering that copper at a price below the world market on copper, why on earth should any foreign shipper ship copper to this market when he can ship his copper to some other market and get a higher price? Perhaps our Government operations here are contributing greatly to the absence of copper in the United States. I should think the gentleman from the West would be inquiring as to who is manipulating this market and how it is being manipulated, if that is being done.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. It is with some hesitation that I enter on a discussion of this subject with the gentleman, but I think this might well be pointed out. During the war the entire supply of copper coming into and distributed in this country was under the control of the Government.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand that.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. The Government under its wartime powers was bringing the copper in free of duty. The Government discontinued its purchases of copper, and discontinued that program last October or November.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And began to unload it.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. They began to unload it a year before that, month by month, bringing in a few thousand tons a month, and allocating a great number of thousands of tons per month, until today we have none. The OPA ceiling on copper was about 12 cents a pound. Since the controls have been released, the price of copper has continually gone up. The most recent price of copper of 21½ cents was fixed by an announcement of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation about a week ago last Friday, when they announced that they were offering on the market their last 55,000 tons of stock pile at the price of 21½ cents. On the next Monday, Phelps-Dodge announced that the price of copper in this country was 21½ cents.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What has been the world price since last Monday?

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. I believe it is 22.85.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is the thing I have been trying to bring out. We have no reason to assume that foreign shippers in other countries shipping goods to this market, whether it is rubber or copper, oil products or otherwise, should send their product here when they can sell them in other world markets at a higher price, and when our Government owns inventories which it is unloading at prices below world market levels from time to time. We have to learn something about this marketing proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. The 4 cents a pound which our buyers had to pay as this import tariff they can now use to compete in the world market and to pay that extra cent and a fraction.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The big point is this: Our Government is now about to get out of copper. It cannot perform in the market any more, so the foreign shippers moving copper this way have an open market in which to sell. We thus begin to clear the channels of trade so goods can flow through them. That is a move in the right direction generally.

One other point: You are going to have to face within a few days a situation on crude rubber very similar to this. We may as well educate ourselves for 2 or 3 minutes here today on this matter, because copper and rubber have been almost exactly in the same position. We have to do something with rubber next week, and I am quite positive we will do it.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. In this matter of the price of copper when there is such a short supply as we have now, it is not reasonable to assume that Phelps Dodge and other big companies are going to be able to set any kind of price they desire in the open market.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; they could not do that unless they controlled the copper stocks of the world.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. There are no stocks to speak of.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But they are going to produce copper throughout the world.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. They are going to produce copper, but they do not have it right now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If they are not going to produce copper throughout the world, then why is the gentleman so fearful of goods coming into this country to compete with his own mines? If you are going to have a market of 25 or 35 cents for copper, certainly they are going to produce copper in this country.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. If the gentleman recalls what I said, I was very doubtful that much copper would be imreported into this country under a suspension of the 4-cent copper excise tax.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the gentleman is doubtful that copper is going to come in, why does he fear foreign competition? It may be that the large copper producers of the United States control a substantial proportion of all the copper produced in foreign fields. If this be true, it may be there is some manipulation of the market on the part of our large domestic copper producers. For instance, suppose our domestic producers of crude or raw copper wanted to also enter the field of producing industrial products with a substantial copper base—thus more completely integrating their operations—and bill their foreign and domestic produced copper to themselves here in the United States at a price substantially below the world copper price. That would give them a great advantage in the United States market for fabricated copper goods. They could still sell their excess foreign production in the world market at a price substantially higher than the price at which they billed themselves copper to be used in fabricating goods for the United States market and get along pretty well.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the bill and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Montana [Mr. D'EWART].

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment to limit the suspension of the copper import tax to a period of 2 years.

I represent a State in which copper mining is an important industry and the sole support of a very large segment of the population. We are familiar with the history of copper production over the years, and we feel very strongly that suspension of the import tax for any period longer than 2 years would be extremely dangerous.

The mining industry is one in which continued operations and development work are essential to success. A mine once closed cannot be reopened on a moment's notice to satisfy the needs of an emergency. Closing a mine inevitably results in the loss of mineral resources as well as the advantages of all the work that has gone before. Our known reserves of copper ore are now about 21,000,000 tons, not a great amount and surely not enough to permit waste or loss. Our experiences in the recent war demonstrate clearly that we cannot afford to be caught short of strategic materials should another emergency arise from the present extremely unsettled conditions of world affairs. An active mining industry is our only assurance of preparedness and the only way we can continue to have a maximum development and use of our mineral resources. I believe that the suspension of copper import taxes for longer than the 2 years suggested in this amendment would seriously impair or even destroy a large part of our presently active copper-mining industry.

The present large demand for copper is an excess demand built up during the war years when our industrial users of copper received less than half of their normal annual consumption and when large quantities of copper in use were salvaged for war materials. This demand can be satisfied in a relatively short time. The most optimistic estimate of our peacetime requirements of copper after the present excess demand is satisfied is that we will need 850,000 tons per year. Our domestic producers can produce enough to satisfy that demand.

From our experiences in the 4 years from 1929 until the present import tax was imposed we know that foreign producers can undersell our domestic producers and displace a large segment of the industry. If the present tax is suspended for a period longer than is needed to take care of the excess demand these foreign producers will be able once again to flood the market. They will be encouraged to expand their development for that very purpose, at the same time that our producers, uncertain of the future, will be forced to curtail operations. We cannot afford to let this occur. The country needs an active and developing copper industry. The industry cannot be active or develop unless it has assurance that it will be protected in future years when the present excess demand is satisfied. For that reason I believe that we must limit this suspension as nearly as possible to the time that is necessary to satisfy this demand, and I think that any suspension for longer than 2 years will do irreparable harm to an important strategic mineral industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HARLESS].

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, it is with reluctance that I take additional time, but there have been some things said here which I think should be clarified. We admit there is a shortage of copper. We in the Western States are willing to go along on a compromise as suggested until June 30, 1948. The reason we do not want a longer moratorium on the tariff is to prevent a possible destruction of the copper-mining industry. No one can predict what the world conditions will be or even what the national conditions will be for more than a year.

We are interested in seeing a healthy copper-mining industry in this country. I am sure the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle would not want to see it destroyed. Our national defense depends upon this industry. Throughout the war, the copper industry suffered. The men who worked in the industry were not exempted from the draft. The OPA froze the price of copper at 12 cents, and as a result in 1945 the mines were operating at 35 percent or 40 percent capacity. Last year we suffered a 4-month strike, not because the mines were not willing to raise the wages at the request of the miners, but because certain people in the OPA wanted the wage increase paid out of premiums instead of increased prices. Everything has been done to cripple this industry. I maintain if you extend this moratorium more than 15 months you will continue to cripple it.

I am going along with the 2-year compromise because I know 3 years would be worse. I am not conceding that we should have more than 1 year. None other an authority than John Church, who was head of the Metals Division of the War Production Board during the war, made the statement that if we lift this tariff now we would get between twenty and thirty thousand tons of copper a month from foreign sources during the next year. That would mean between two hundred and fifty and three hundred and fifty thousand tons during the next year. Copper would begin to flow into this country. If we have any kind of recession or depression, that means that the copper mines in this country in less than a year will begin to close. Once you close a copper mine and let it be flooded with water, it is closed permanently.

So, we plead with you not to destroy this industry. This industry means too much to the American people to destroy it. Once you lower the domestic production of copper, you have weakened the defense of our Nation.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] raised a very pertinent question a few minutes ago. The gentleman happens to be the author of a resolution which the committee passed this week which does practically the same thing which he tried to do in regard to cotton.

I have been primarily concerned and I am as concerned about stock piling as is the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN], We handled a stock pile in 1935 and in 1940 and again in Public Law 520. I am wondering how far we are going and how many more of these metals are going to be placed in the same category as the one we are talking about today, because several more of them are in about the same position as copper. I refer to zinc, tungsten, and some others. I am not concerned about where we get this copper, especially. I want a stock pile of copper. In fact, we were faced with a message from the President today which commits us to a very definite program and I am sure every man on this floor is concerned about it.

In Public Law 520 we were very careful to protect our American manufacturers and miners. I do not know where all of this interest comes from today. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] has raised a question on this world market and our domestic market price. Probably it would be wise to go along with this resolution for the length of time provided in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. ROCKWELL]. I am hopeful that this Congress will recognize not only the scarcity of this material but that we will take immediate action on some of these other off-shore, scarce strategic metals. I think probably zinc is in a worse position than copper. We have not heard from the zinc people yet, but I expect this committee will be hearing from them very soon. I think tungsten is in about the same shape and we will be hearing from them, also.

We have adopted a very definite policy in Public Law 520, and I am hoping this Congress is not going to come out with piecemeal legislation to destroy what we have set up to protect our domestic market, because we all realize the condition we were in in 1939 and 1940. Certainly we do not want to get into that shape again.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM] has expired.

All time has expired.

The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. ROCKWELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DIRKSEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill

(H. R. 2404) to suspend certain import taxes on copper, pursuant to House Resolution 140, he reported the same back to the House with an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. ROCKWELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HARDY, for March 13 and 14, on account of official business.

To Mr. DORN, for Thursday and Friday of this week, on account of official business.

To Mr. SNYDER, for Thursday and Friday of this week, on account of official business.

PERMANENT NURSE CORPS OF THE ARMY AND NAVY AND WOMEN'S SPECIALIST CORPS IN THE ARMY

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SMITH].

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, a rule has been granted on the bill (H. R. 1943) to establish a permanent Nurse Corps of the Army and the Navy and to establish a Women's Medical Specialist Corps in the Army, but to expedite action I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and that general debate be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided between the majority and minority sides.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire if this procedure will permit amendments?

The SPEAKER. Amendments may be offered, but the 5-minute rule will apply to the discussion of amendments.

The gentlewoman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and that general debate be limited to 1 hour to be equally divided between the majority and minority sides.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the majority side may be controlled by the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill, and the other half by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from Maine is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us (H. R. 1943) to establish a permanent Nurse Corps of the Army and the Navy and to establish a Women's Medical Specialist Corps in the Army, is the result of committee work on two bills.

H. R. 1673, introduced by the chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], was a departmental bill to reorganize the Nurse Corps of the Navy and of the Naval Reserve.

H. R. 1373, introduced by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON], was also a departmental bill to reorganize the Nurse Corps of the Army and the Women's Specialist Corps of the Army and of the Army Reserve. The distinguished gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] has through the years contributed much to the medical program of the armed services.

One of the basic motivations of the merging of the Military Affairs and Naval Affairs Committee into the single Armed Services Committee was the obvious need for greater uniformity in the administration and policies of the Army and Navy.

Under the able direction of the chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], the merged committee is working toward that goal.

While there has been much controversial discussion about the merging of certain functions of the Army and Navy in the Executive Department, one area of greatest agreement as to more adaptable integration has been that of hospitalization and medical organization of the armed services.

The Subcommittee of the Armed Services, of which I am chairman, has jurisdiction over all medical matters, including hospitalization, evacuation, sanitation, health, venereal-disease control, mental hygiene, neuropsychiatry, dentistry, veterinary, medicine, nursing, dietetics, physiotherapy, and the medical organization of the armed services.

The subcommittee in striving for the goal of greater uniformity considered the two separate bills, one with respect to the Army, the other with respect to the Navy, but both with respect to the Nurse Corps of each service. In other words an Army bill and a Navy bill on the same subject were discussed at the same hearing by the same subcommittee instead of at separate hearings by separate committees as in the past. This was done because the committee was conscious of the desirability and necessity of legislating for the armed services as a whole rather than specially for each service.

After complete hearings the subcommittee reported out one bill with similar provisions for both the Army and the Navy. The full Committee on Armed Services has reported this bill, H. R. 1943, favorably to the House and it is now before us for consideration.

There is not anything new about this proposal. It is simply making permanent the wartime program for nurses, dietitians, physiotherapists, and occupational therapists.

You know the history of the Nurse Corps and the admirable service rendered by the nurses, dietitians, physiotherapists, and occupational therapists during the past war, so I will confine my remarks to the major features of the bill and to the need for its enactment.

Under present legislation both Army and Navy nurses are occupying temporary commissioned rank. With the ending of the war emergency and without new legislation the members of the Army Nurse Corps, the Women's Medical Specialist Corps of the Regular Army, and the Navy Nurse Corps will revert to relative rank and to the prewar scale of pay allowances which, under the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, began with the sum of $1,080 per annum to the top pay of $1,800 per annum for a person having served 12 years, after which there were no increases.

Maj. Gen. Norman Kirk, Surgeon General of the United States Army, and Admiral Clifford E. Swanson, Chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery of the United States Navy, both testified, during the course of the hearing on this bill, that a reversion to the prewar pay scales would result in a complete dissolution of the Army and Navy Nurse Corps.

This bill is in two sections. Title I pertains to the Army and title II to the Navy. Although the wording differs somewhat, the provisions are practically the same, so much so that under this proposed legislation a nurse could transfer from one branch of the service to the other without detriment to herself or to the service.

H. R. 1943 provides that—

First. Army and Navy nurses and personnel of the Women's Medical Specialist Corps of the Army would be commissioned on a permanent status, the same as all male officers.

Second. Pay, leave, money allowances for subsistence and rental of quarters, mileage and other travel allowances, benefits, and emoluments would be the same as for male officers.

Third. Provisions for promotion would be the same as for male officers except that Army nurses and specialists above the rank of captain and Navy nurses above the rank of lieutenant would be chosen by selection boards.

Fourth. Retirement provisions would be the same as for male officers except that the retirement age is reduced to 55 years in the ranks above captain in the Army and above lieutenant in the Navy, and at 50 years in all ranks below captain in the Army and lieutenant in the Navy, and retirement pay would be based on 2½ percent per annum, the same as all officers of the Army and the Navy.

Fifth. The proposed legislation would establish similar provisions for nurses of both the Army and the Navy with exactly the same pay and allowances.

Failure to enact appropriate legislation would place the medical branches of the armed services in the impossible position of attempting to compete with civilian nursing agencies which offer a more attractive salary and less personal deprivation.

This gives you briefly the purpose and provisions of this measure. Actually all the bill does is to make permanent the present program for nurses in the Medical Corps of the Army and the Navy. In other words, giving permanent commissioned status instead of the temporary wartime status.

This legislation would not result in any increased per capita expenditures over those maintained during the wartime period.

The War Department and the Navy Department favor this proposed legislation. General Kirk, Surgeon General of the Army, and Admiral Swanson, Surgeon General of the Navy, were most helpful in preparing one bill with similar provision.

The members of the subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee worked diligently on this measure. The chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] were most helpful to the subcommittee in their earnest participation at the hearing. The full committee discussed the bill and voted unanimously to report it out. The Rules Committee was prompt in reporting favorably upon it.

H. R. 1943 is not controversial. It is essential to the armed services and I hope this bill, H. R. 1943, will be passed by the House in its present form.

I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is it not a fact that this bill wipes out the discrimination between female officers and male officers that has heretofore prevailed?

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. This is the culmination of 3 or 4 years' effort by the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], now addressing the House, and also by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON], trying to eliminate this discrimination. The gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] appeared before the Military Affairs Committee during the Seventy-ninth Congress supporting a similar bill.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Yes, the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] has contributed a great deal to the medical services.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. And so has the gentlewoman from Maine.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. This, however, does not wipe out the inequality and the discrimination as between male medical corpsmen, who serve 4, 8, 12, 16 years, or more, becoming very expert to the extent that they can actually operate in submarines and far out at sea. They are never any more than a pharmacist mate. But a young nurse comes into the service and she is immediately commissioned. It does not eliminate that discrimination, it does not give a break to the corpsman who has served faithfully the Army or Navy for from 4 to 16 or 20 years. It does not give him the same status as a nurse who comes into the service, does it?

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. The corpsmen are not included in this bill.

Mr. DINGELL. Yes. They still remain corpsmen.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. As far as this bill is concerned, yes.

Mr. DINGELL. Therefore, the discrimination still exists so far as the faithful corpsmen are concerned who have served in the service for many years.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. They are in a different status and are being considered by the committee in another bill.

Mr. DINGELL. Of course. They are in the status of suspended animation. That ought to be corrected, I may say to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Under the provisions of a bill we have now under consideration in committee, we are opening the way for those young men to aspire to a commission. In fact, there has been a great deal of discussion in the committee. I am thoroughly in accord with the gentleman's point of view that these boys should be able to go into the service and go on up through the ranks as a result of their own effort, initiative, and ability. They will have the opportunity to get commissions and we are going to make an effort in the other bill to take care of a matter of that kind.

Mr. DINGELL. I am glad to hear my friend say that because it is something that has needed correction for many years.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill represents the culmination of a number of weeks of effort on the part of the subcommittee, of which the distinguished gentlewoman of Maine is chairman, as well as many, many months of work of the old Committee on Military Affairs, as well as many, many months of work of the old Committee on Naval Affairs. We had to sit down at the table in the preparation of this bill before presentation to you; the Army and the Navy working hand and hand to try to do something for the nurse who was one of the unsung heroes of this war. There is today a shortage in the Army of 1,500 nurses. There is today a shortage in the Navy of at least 1,000 nurses. If hostilities were declared terminated today, if the war were declared over today, 6 months thereafter you would not have one nurse, I venture to say, in the Army or the Navy, because they could not live on the pay scale, and the only way they can exist today is by reason of emergency legislation which raises the pay to a living standard.

We recognized that terrible deficiency and that terrible probability. That is the reason we have brought in a bill which will take care of any unforeseen situations such as that. To the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] we owe a great debt of gratitude for her contribution, and as for the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] I need not tell you what she has done. The Army will have a minimum of probably 2,558 nurses, and the Navy around 2,200. The ratio, as my distinguished chairman has told you, in this bill is 6 to every 100. It will have to be measured on a percentage of the ultimate strength of the Army and the Navy, and it will be a sliding scale, and as it naturally goes up or the minimum goes down, the number will be measured accordingly.

I should like to read an excerpt on this subject from the Army and Navy Journal, which has long followed this probability, in the event that hostilities were declared over. This was was prepared February 8.

Prompt congressional action on the bills giving the nurses of the Army and Navy permanent commissioned status is urgently demanded in order that the armed forces may retain in their postwar establishments the services of those professional women whose skill and efficiency was so strikingly demonstrated in the active theaters and in the zone of the interior throughout the war. It was a significant as well as a gracious gesture on the part of Chairman W. G. ANDREWS (Republican, New York), of the House Committee on Armed Services, when he yielded to Representative FRANCES P. BOLTON (Republican, Ohio) the prerogative (usually reserved for the chairman) of introducing the War Department's proposed draft of a bill to revise the Medical Department, which bill carries the provisions for the nurses. Mrs. BOLTON is not a member of the committee, but she is an ardent advocate of giving proper recognition and status to the service nurses and in the last session severely criticized the War Department for its failure to submit recommendations in time for action before the expiration of the Seventy-ninth Congress. Another Congresswoman, Representative MARGARET CHASE SMITH (Republican, Maine), is chairman of the subcommittee, which this week began hearings on the reorganization of the Nurse Corps of both the Army and Navy. Thus, with the collaboration of Mrs. SMITH and Mrs. BOLTON a sympathetic consideration is assured. The record of the services' nurses has been such a sparkling page in the history of the war, one marked by all the admirable traits of bravery, efficiency, sympathy, patience, and humaneness, that it seems the measures for their betterment must merit universal support. But it is speed that is now needed, for day by day war-experienced, capable nurses are accepting discharge from the Army and Navy and seeking to establish themselves in civilian positions while there is still such universal demand for their professional abilities. Many of these would rather stay in the armed forces if they were assured that their future career is safeguarded, that they will be eligible for retention, and that their present commissioned status, now held only by virtue of emergency legislation, will be retained. To help keep these fine women, the committee should assure, in the bill that it approved, that those nurses who served capably and efficiently in Reserve status through the war will be eligible for permanent commissions in the Regular Establishment and that there will be no arbitrarily low age limit set to bar now those who were of the proper age when they first entered on active duty.

Mr. Speaker, when we passed legislation last year giving the Veterans' Administration authority to hire nurses the wage scale was way up, so much so that we unwittingly caused a raid on nurses so that the Army and the Navy were by virtue of that law not able to retain these nurses. We have to do something to retain these experienced, patriotic women who contributed so terribly much in that time of dire need in our country's emergency.

I know this bill will not need very much debate, and I am sure it will merit your consideration and will pass. It is unanimously reported, and has the backing of the entire committee.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. What was the gentleman reading from a moment ago that contained the reference to the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] and the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON]? Was it the committee report?

Mr. RIVERS. It was the Army and Navy Journal.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this is what we might well call emergency legislation, because if it is not enacted into law, since the war emergency is over all the nurses in both the Army and the Navy will revert back to their prewar status, where the minimum pay was $1,080 a year and the maximum $1,800 a year. In order to retain the nurses in the service during the war period we had to give them temporary commissioned rank. With that rank, of course, came the commissioned rates of pay, subsistence allowances, and all the benefits the commissioned officers in the Army and the Navy received. The purpose of this bill in establishing the Army Nurse Corps and the Women's Medical Specialist Corps as well as the Navy Nurse Corps is to give them permanent rank so that some inducement may be offered to the women of this country who are willing to offer their services to the military branches of this Government so that they will at least be given some recognition along the same lines as we give commissioned officers in both the Army and the Navy. We must keep in mind that unless this bill becomes law, as the term of enlistment of these women expires they are going to go back into the more lucrative practice in private life, where the opportunities are so much greater than they will be in the military branches of the Government.

If we say to the nurses in both the Army and Navy today, "After your term of enlistment has expired, you go from the commission pay down to what we call the prewar pay of $1,080 a year to $1,800 a year, we are simply not going to have any nurses stay in the military service of our Government." In order to recognize their ability, we must give them not only the same relative rank that they enjoyed as commissioned officers of both branches of the service, but we must also give them the same rate of pay, emoluments, subsistence, retirement benefits, and all the other benefits that we now give the commissioned men in both the Army and Navy.

At the present time we are informed by the Navy Department that they are approximately 1,000 Navy nurses short of their requirements, and that the Army is 1,500 nurses short of their requirements. As the terms of service of these nurses expire, it will simply increase the shortage to a point where a real danger arises which will affect the welfare of the men and women who are still in the military services. This matter has been very thoroughly discussed in subcommittee over a period of a number of weeks. We have gone into every phase of this whole subject matter and have had the benefit of experience to guide us in recommending this legislation to the Congress in order to take care of this emergency which is facing the military forces. As a result of that study and thorough consideration, the legislation was sponsored by both the Army and Navy and recommended by the Bureau of the Budget.

We have brought in a unanimous report not only from the subcommittee considering this legislation but also the Armed Services Committee of the House. I hope and trust, Mr. Speaker, that the Members of the House will unanimously approve this bill in the interest of safeguarding the health of our men and giving an inducement to the young women of the country who have the necessary qualifications to offer their services so that we may meet the requirements of our military branches.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy Members are present; not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, March 13, 1947, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 13, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Great is the Lord and greatly to be praised; with rapture we meditate upon Thy measureless mercy. So long as there is a sun to drive away the darkness; so long as there is a bird to sing away the sadness of the human heart; so long as there is a wanderer wearing the scarred image of the Father, so long is there a redeeming love in the heart of our world's Saviour.

O Light Divine, our way is dim, uncertain, and perilous. We beseech Thee, these fateful days, to light up the plains of peace; to hover over this sin-wrought earth, struggling to be free because of distrust, ignorance, and low ambitions. Whatever is done in this Chamber, grant that those God-given rights—the right to live and work, the right of self-assertion, the right to worship—may be upheld. O safeguard us that we may never forfeit these blessings, which were wrought by sacrifice, toil, and death.

With Thy presence, Lord, do Thou bless our President; keep him in the circle of divine love and care, and restore him in rest to his urgent duties. In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

H. J. Res. 27. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the terms of office of the President.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the foregoing joint resolution, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WILEY, Mr. FERGUSON, Mr. REVERCOMB, Mr. MCCARRAN, and Mr. EASTLAND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1968) entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947, and for other purposes."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. BOLTON asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan asked and was given permission to extend the remarks he expected to make later in the day on House Resolution 76 and to include therein certain tables.

Mr. COFFIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix and include an editorial by John S. Knight that appeared in the Detroit Free Press of Sunday, March 9.

Mr. LEA (at the request of Mr. PRIEST) was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

SPECIAL ORDER WITHDRAWN

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order I had for today may be vacated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

DEMOCRACY MUST TAKE A STAND

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, it has been truly said that politics make strange bedfellows, but never has the same political quilt covered such a diversified lot of statesmen as those who are today appearing out of the clearing mists of the speech delivered on the floor of this House yesterday. Those who subscribe in humble fealty to the Kremlin line and those who retch and gag at the very suggestion of Communist doctrine have linked arms in some of the most ludicrous pairings ever suggested by the mind of living mortal.

The President yesterday tiptoed through the tulips of diplomacy without crushing a tender blossom of Soviet sensibility. We can well imagine that Mr. Chamberlain's vulnerable umbrella is somewhere being dusted off for another jaunt to Armageddon, to a belated Munich, where this Nation, speaking gently in a tornado of human passion, will continue to follow the practice of crucifying the hopes and aspirations of free men and women upon the cross of our timidity in the face of decision.

Somewhere we must take a stand and assert our belief in democratic processes as opposed to the strangulation of freedom. I, for one, prefer to take that stand in Istanbul or Athens, rather than in Charleston, Newark, or San Francisco. The noose is drawing tighter, Mr. Speaker. Soon there may not be room to insert restraining fingers between the hemp and our throats.

But let us place the issue before the American people on the basis of the one issue: Democracy or communism—our form or another. There is no other question.

THE ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL ACT

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Seventy-ninth Congress made a mistake in passing the Atomic Energy Control Act. I am today introducing a bill to repeal that act and place atomic energy back in the War Department, where it belongs. In view of the new world emergency, it is my belief that the secrets and the control of the atom bomb and energy can best be guarded by the Miltary Establishments.

WAR ASSETS ADMINISTRATION BUNGLING

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, there is a good deal of criticism about the way the War Assets Administration runs its business. Today I have an example of their business methods that tells the story in a nutshell and explains why this Administration is the object of so much criticism.

An industrial firm in my district was asked to bid on a certain lot of goods in Ohio on the 10th of October 1946.

On the 7th of November they sent three men to Columbus, Ohio, to inspect and appraise the goods.

On the 20th of November they sent in a bid.

On the 13th of December they were notified their bid had been accepted; and they made preparation to handle the material.

Now, on the 3d of March, 3 months later, they are notified that the material has been withdrawn from sale.

God help the country as long as our business is operated by such fellows as run the War Assets Administration. I understand War Assets has taken on thousands of employees from the OPA. Maybe this accounts for this kind of business.

The withdrawal of this goods may be in conformity with War Assets policy, but it is still poor business. And why 3 months to make up their minds? Maybe by good business methods War Assets could sell surplus property to better advantage.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ANDREWS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include a speech made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOYKIN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

[Mr. ANDREWS of Alabama addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. PLUMLEY (at the request of Mr. ARENDS) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and to include short editorials.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of business on the Speaker's table today and after any special orders heretofore entered I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THE LATE WALTER S. GOODLAND

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, the people of Wisconsin are sad today because of the death of the grand old man of Wisconsin, Gov. Walter S. Goodland.

Walter Goodland was born on a farm in Sharon, Wis., in December 1862. Had he lived until next December he would have been 85 years of age.

Governor Goodland has been Governor of Wisconsin for the past 4 years. He was a man who stood at all times on the principles of the Golden Rule. He was a man of the people. His every thought was in the interest of the people. He was not impressed by pressure groups of any kind. If legislation were for the good of the people of the State of Wisconsin Governor Goodland was for it. If in his opinion the legislation was good only for certain special interests and not for the good of the people as a whole Governor Goodland could be counted on being against it.

He preached the principles of the Sermon on the Mount and practiced them as Governor of the State of Wisconsin. The principles as practiced by Governor Goodland in public office might well be emulated by every man in public office today.

In the death of Walter Goodland the people of Wisconsin have lost a true friend.

COMMUNIST IMPERTINENCE

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Speaker, apparently the American Communists consider that they are the sole repositories of all wisdom and that through some form of cultural osmosis that wisdom emanates from each small cell in their set-up.

Hardly had President Truman finished speaking yesterday—and I know that many Members here in Congress are still pondering what will be the answer—when a Communist group from my congressional district, I am sorry to state, sent me a telegram and in dogmatic terms said that the Greek people have an undemocratic government; also, they make the accusation in the telegram that President Truman has betrayed the American people. I do not agree with everything that my President says and comes forward with, but, believe me, I would think 10 times—yes; a hundred times—before I would accuse him of betraying the American people, as these Communists do.

SURPLUS PROPERTY FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON]?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the membership knows that the Comptroller General has just issued a ruling to the effect that the RFC can no longer use any of its funds for exercising its statutory priority to obtain surplus property on behalf of small business.

This is not in accordance with the intent and purpose of the Congress, and I sincerely trust that prompt action will be had to see to it that the will of this Congress is carried out. Without such prompt action on our part, small business will have little further chance to purchase War Assets materials at terms possible to them.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOLIFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, because of official business, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY] may be granted leave of absence for today and tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PERMANENT NURSE CORPS OF THE ARMY AND NAVY AND WOMEN'S MEDICAL SPECIALIST CORPS IN THE ARMY

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business before the House is the bill (H. R. 1943) to establish a permanent Nurse Corps of the Army and the Navy and to establish a Women's Medical Specialist Corps in the Army.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS].

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the member from New York [Mr. POWELL].

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this most excellent bill. It is a bill which comes, I understand, from the committee, with unanimous support of all members of that committee, and is, therefore, a bipartisan bill, a bill which provides something which we have always needed and that is a permanent Nursing Corps.

I have just one objection which I will present later in the form of an amendment. I would like to say that in presenting this amendment I feel that it is not due to the fact that the committee intentionally left it out. I merely believe that it was due to the fact that the proper organizations did not come before the committee and present it. My proposed amendment is identical with the amendment which was offered on this floor exactly 2 years ago by my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. CLARENCE BROWN. Exactly 2 years ago, on March 6, 1945, the Honorable CLARENCE BROWN offered an amendment to the bill which was then called the draft nurses bill. Those of us who were here then will remember that our late President and Commander in Chief, Mr. Roosevelt, urged us to pass a bill so that we could draft nurses. We needed them in the conduct of the war, and the Honorable CLARENCE BROWN introduced an amendment at that time which is identical with the one which I will introduce, saying that in the drafting of nurses, in bringing nurses into the Army and the Navy, there should be no discrimination on account of creed, race, color, or national origin.

We all agree with the amendment to be offered here, because an identical amendment passed the House on March 6, 1945, unanimously, without division, without tellers; and then when the bill came before us the next day for final passage that amendment was still in it, and that bill was passed. The vote on that day, I think, was about three-hundred-and-something to forty-odd—I forget the exact number; I have it before me here. This is something we already agreed on 2 years ago, and I am sure you Republicans, especially, have not changed.

I would like to say that this proposed amendment, providing that nurses shall be included in our permanent Nurse Corps, without regard to race, creed, or color, is not set up on a quota basis; it does not force the appointment of a certain number. It merely gives the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, an opportunity to see that people of our Nation, loyal, qualified female citizens, regardless of race, creed, or color, shall be included in the permanent Nursing Corps.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman include a provision in there that they shall not be discriminated against because of membership in or lack of membership in a union?

Mr. POWELL. No; I do not do that.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Why not?

Mr. POWELL. Well, if the gentleman wants to do that, let him introduce it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Well, why do you not?

Mr. POWELL. I will talk to the gentleman after my speech, and maybe we can get together on it.

Now, I would like to say that an identical amendment went through unanimously once before and there was no objection raised, and my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] was in the chair as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and all of us voted in favor of it. I am sure we want a permanent nursing corps which will include all American citizens, and this is a guaranty that all will be included.

May I remind you that the President has the right to appoint them with the advice and consent of the Senate. May I also say that until this amendment was passed 2 years ago the Navy had not appointed a single Negro nurse, despite the fact that we needed 6,000 then and 9,000 were ready. But after it was passed by us unanimously, the Navy did appoint Negro women to the nursing corps of the Navy and they served in combat. In the language of the American Red Cross, and I read from the History of the American Red Cross:

> Negro nurses were assigned to general wards, and they were serious-minded, quiet, and businesslike young women.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON].

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Armed Services brings before the House today H. R. 1943, a bill to establish a permanent Nurse Corps of the Army and Navy and to establish a Women's Medical Specialist Corps in the Army. This act is to be known as the Army-Navy Nurses Act of 1947. It is presented to you by MARGARET CHASE SMITH, Congresswoman from the Second District of Maine, and chairman of Subcommittee No. 9 on Hospitalization, Health—Medical Corps. The committee has made a most exhaustive study of the whole situation of nursing as it applies to our services.

This is a combination of two bills—H. R. 1673, which, through the courtesy of the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, was introduced by myself, H. R. 1673, proposing to revise the Medical Department of the Army, and for other purposes—and a similar bill for the Navy introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], chairman of the Committee on Armed Services.

A very careful study has been made by the subcommittee of the history and the functions of these services. Under the able leadership of the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] practically all differences between the services have been harmonized. Do not let yourselves be confused by the language contained in the two titles. You will find that there is a difference, but the facts and the conclusions are the same.

H. R. 1943 brings to a final conclusion the efforts made over a long period of years to give commissioned status to the nurses of the Army and the Navy, and latterly to the newer groups to be known as the Women's Medical Specialist Corps—dietitians, physical therapists, and occupational therapists—all of whom are now a recognized and necessary part of the Army medical set-up. Starting as civilian employees, these women were given a military status for World War II.

Thanks to Col. Florence Blanchfield, Superintendent of the Army Nurse Corps, and the outstanding ability and devotion she demonstrated to duty by her precept and example in inspiring the Army Nurse Corps during this last war, the nurses have had an opportunity to do extraordinary work. Established in 1901 with 400 Spanish-American War veterans, the Army Nurse Corps grew until in World War II the Army had about 60,000 nurses in uniform.

When one remembers that the first nurses who went in on D–4 going over the sides of the ships, working shoulder-to-shoulder with the doctors, there are no words with which to express one's gratitude and appreciation.

The Navy Nursing Corps was founded by act of Congress in May 1908 with 20 nurses. In the First World War the corps reached a capacity of 1,490. In the Second World War the capacity was increased to 11,086. There are now 2,300 members enrolled.

I would like to make special mention at this moment, of certain nurses new to the service: the Negro nurse group. My memory is that there were some 600 in all. I, myself, reviewed the first group in England after they finished their orientation. I followed them with a great deal of interest. They have done splendid work.

It seems to me that if there is one bill where we are justified in omitting reference to discrimination because of race, and so forth, it is this bill. I believe the gentleman who is introducing such an amendment can have no doubt as to my stand, so clearly shown in my record. I trust that he will not misunderstand when I say that it seems to me most unfortunate that this matter is brought up to us at this point. The need is not there, for both the Army and Navy use Negro nurses as part of their corps. We have reached the point where Negro nurses have proven themselves, from here out their acceptance or rejection will depend upon ability and qualification.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. BOLTON. I yield. But I cannot refrain from saying that I hope the gentleman will reconsider——

Mr. POWELL. May I say to the gentlewoman that I know her attitude and have known it for a long time before I came to Congress.

But until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], introduced that amendment 2 years ago, the United States Navy did not have one single Negro nurse.

Mrs. BOLTON. I believe that was because they had no Negroes at all.

Mr. POWELL. No; that is not the reason.

Mrs. BOLTON. I meant, in the officer positions. All the Navy nurses are officers. Was it not true that the moment any Negroes were allowed, of course, they took them. The Corps had been ready to use Negro nurses for a long while.

Mr. POWELL. I am sorry to disagree with the gentlewoman, because at that time there were 28 commissioned officers who were commissioned at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station, and I happened to be present at the time they were commissioned.

Mrs. BOLTON. Perhaps the gentleman's information is broader than mine, but I do know there is no question in the Army or Navy as to the need, usefulness, and happy acceptance of nurses who qualify. They must qualify as nurses just as any white nurse must qualify.

Mr. POWELL. If the gentlewoman will yield another moment, I am sure what she says is true, but nevertheless when we passed the Selective Service Act which applied to men, we put that clause, section 4, in the act.

Mrs. BOLTON. Does it not seem to the gentleman that when a matter such as this has been clarified, it would be unfortunate to dig up some of the past and insist upon bringing it into the present and extending it into the future?

Mr. POWELL. If that would guarantee the future, I do not think it is unfortunate.

Mrs. BOLTON. It is not a question of a guaranty because this is now a matter of tradition and a matter of the rules and regulations of the organizations involved. Of course, that may not be true in other places. But I should so like to see us here in the Congress with reference to the profession of nursing recognize that we have no discriminatory methods in nursing.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. BOLTON. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. Is it not true that there is no discrimination now?

Mrs. BOLTON. That is absolutely the case.

Mr. THOMASON. The present system is working well so there is no necessity for any such amendment.

Mrs. BOLTON. That is correct.

Mr. THOMASON. It would just help to stir the problem up. Nobody is being discriminated against under existing law and this just takes care of a voluntary situation.

Mrs. BOLTON. My point is, and I do not know that I make it clear: I think the whole problem of discrimination against minorities will be helped by not having this amendment in the bill which has to do with corps who are using Negro nurses who qualify, regardless of any possible difficulties that may have arisen in the past.

During the First World War in order to insure proper administration of the hospital wards, we saw relative rank granted. Then, in this war we had temporary commissioned status.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] has expired.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentlewoman 2 additional minutes.

Mrs. BOLTON. Thank you, Madam Chairman. Relative rank as a present possibility was such a serious menace that we are fortunate to have a man with the understanding of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] as chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

I have no doubt of the action of this House on the bill. We have long known that if we are to have a proper nurse corps in any of our armed services we shall have to grant them the commissioned status of officers in the Army and the Navy.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM].

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, of course, the committee appreciates very much the interesting work and helpfulness which the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] has given to the subcommittee in working out this piece of legislation.

There was no objection.

PERMANENT NURSE CORPS OF THE ARMY AND NAVY AND WOMEN'S SPECIALIST CORPS IN THE ARMY

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM] is recognized.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, I want the House to know that I did not make this point of no quorum.

As I said in the beginning, we appreciate very much the remarks made by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] on this bill. She has been very helpful. Also the chairman of the committee, the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SMITH].

We worked out what we feel is one of the best bills following the line of unification that has been brought out of the Committee on Armed Services. We are following a procedure which may be of some interest to the House in other committees. We are taking the Army and the Navy and putting them side by side and trying to parallel the legislation we are bringing before you at the present time. Of course, we will find places along the line where it will be very difficult to put them in line as we have in this Nurse Corps bill.

As you probably know and have been told, this bill makes the Nurse Corps a permanent law. For that reason I think it is a fine piece of legislation both for the Army and the Navy. We all realize the difficulties we faced during war days when nurses were so scarce. Those of us who visited the hospitals throughout the country saw in many places the inadequate nursing facilities. The establishment of this corps is certainly a beginning in trying to render a better service to the armed forces of the Nation.

The bill has three titles. Under title I it sets up first the Nurse Corps in the Army. Then it includes the Specialist Corps. It may be of some interest to know that we have already included in this corps dietitians, physical therapists, and occupational therapists—the three groups.

There is practically no disagreement in the committee on this legislation. About the only thing we disagreed on was this: At the present time, under the retirement system in the Army, we are paying nurses 3 percent of their base salary on retirement. The Navy has the policy of 2½ percent, with which you are all familiar. Of course, I feel that the 3 percent is a fair retirement percentage. I think we have to take into consideration the age of the entry of these nurses in the Army. It was not the same when we took up this legislation. A girl can go into this corps until she is 28 years of age. Necessarily she has to retire at the age of 50 because of the fact that most of the ladies who do strenuous nursing at that age get to the point where their usefulness is not as efficient as when they were younger. So this act forces them to retire at the age of 50, except the head of the corps, who can serve up to the age of 55. In forcing them to retire at that age, their retirement pay at 2½ percent will be very small security, and she has spent the better part of her life in the service of her country. For that reason I felt we should have written into the bill 3 percent retirement instead of 2½ percent, which the bill carries before us. However, after discussing the matter for several days we agreed to bring the bill out with 2½ percent, and I do not expect to offer an amendment to change the retirement percentage. All male officers serve to an older age and higher rank. Most of the nurses will have to retire in low rank. For this reason I felt the retirement should have been 3 percent. I do, however, want to call it to the attention of the committee. There is still a great shortage of nurses at the present time, as we all know. We are all too familiar with the fact that in the hospitals in our own home towns we are having difficulty in securing nurses.

This bill goes far enough, I believe, to offer an inducement to nurses to enter the service. It provides permanent rank and it raises the base pay, as was pointed out heretofore. We are in the position today of having to compete with the Veterans' Bureau which, of course, has a higher salary schedule. As all of us are aware, we felt that the Veterans' Administration last year should be allowed to give this inducement to secure the nurses they needed and we therefore provided a high enough salary base that we thought would be attractive.

The nurse in this corps will have some advantages. She will have security, she will have retirement. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not amend the bill materially. I think it is a well written piece of legislation and I hope the House will pass the bill unanimously.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I wish to ask about the ratio of nurses to enlisted men, 6 to 1,000. Does the gentlemen feel that in peacetime that is too large or too small a number?

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman from Nebraska is a doctor, and my profession is more or less along that line. I feel it would depend upon the type of nursing. As the gentleman knows in some types that number would be sufficient in all probability, but in others it would not be.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska In the combat zone that might not be enough, but surely during peacetime 6 to 1,000 as compared with what we have in the civilian population is way out of line.

Mr. DURHAM. I will certainly agree with the gentleman that during time of combat when there are many wounded needing treatment that would be a very small number.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] to submit a consent request.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein statements before the Committee on Agriculture.

I also ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. AUCHINCLOSS] may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement made by him before a committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE].

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, it seems remarkable to me that we in this country have not had a permanent Nurse Corps of the Army and Navy ere this.

Such permanent establishments exist in other countries, notably in England, Canada, and Australia.

The nursing profession is a hard and exacting one, and its standards in this country are extremely high. In order to attract the best women in the nursing profession to go into the Army and Navy their status must be permanent and they must be given permanent Army and Navy rank, as this bill proposes to do.

My distinguished colleague the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] expressed my thought admirably in her statement before the committee when she said—and I quote:

> The bill will give commissioned status to certain groups that heretofore have had such status only on a temporary basis after some 20 years of service in a pseudo rank when they assumed all the responsibilities with great credit.

It is also a good thing that this bill increases the number of nurses in the Navy from 4 to 6 per 1,000 bringing them to a parity with the Army. It is to be hoped that both the Army and Navy will in time raise this parity as it still means that too much nursing has to be done by men.

Nursing is a woman's work and I am sure that most men will agree with that statement.

It proved to be so all through the war, the morale of the men was better in hospitals where they were cared for by women. This was notably so at the naval hospital at Mare Island and in Hawaii.

The able Representative from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] has drawn up a bill which should and will have the support of all, regardless of party.

This is not a political question, it is simply giving to the Army and Navy nurses the rank that they have won and improving their pay a little.

It is giving their profession the dignity it must have in order to attract our best young women to enter their ranks.

This profession, the finest any woman can attain and one that a woman can do better than anything else, must be a career that women will glory in. And that Mr. Speaker, they will do more than ever when they are given permanent place in our armed forces.

The armed forces are entitled to the best nursing staff in the world. I believe that the passage of this bill will give them exactly that. For that reason I am happy to give the bill my wholehearted support and hope it passes unanimously.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I have no more requests for time on this side.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Army-Navy Nurses Act of 1947."

(b) Until a date 1 year following the date of enactment of this act any person who is a female citizen of the United States, who is over 21 years of age, and who meets the physical and other qualifications prescribed by the Secretary of War, may be appointed a commissioned officer in the Army Nurse Corps, or the Women's Medical Specialist Corps, Regular Army, established by this act, in a grade as prescribed in section 104 hereof: Provided, That no person shall be appointed a commissioned officer in the Army Nurse Corps under this provision except a person, otherwise qualified, who has not attained the age of 35 on the date of nomination by the President, and who, during any of the wars in which the United States is presently engaged, served honorably on active duty as a commissioned officer of the Army of the United States, pursuant to the act of June 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 324), or as a member, including the status of Reserve nurse, of the Army Nurse Corps created by chapter V of the act of July 9, 1918 (40 Stat. 879): Provided further, That no person shall be appointed a commissioned officer in the Women's Medical Specialist Corps under this section, except a person otherwise qualified, who during any of the wars in which the United States is presently engaged served honorably on active duty as a dietitian or physical therapist with the Medical Department of the Army of the United States appointed pursuant to the act of June 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 324), or who served honorably as an occupational therapist with the Medical Department of the Army in the status of a civilian employee.

SEC. 104. A person appointed under the provisions of this title who is credited, as provided, in section 105 hereof, with less than the minimum length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of first lieutenant, shall be appointed in the grade of second lieutenant; a person credited with service equal to or greater than the minimum length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of first lieutenant, but less than the minimum length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of captain, shall be appointed in the grade of first lieutenant; a person credited with service equal to or greater than the minimum length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of captain, shall be appointed in the grade of captain; majors and lieutenant colonels shall be appointed by selection, to fill vacancies in those grades from among persons who are appointed or are qualified for appointment in the grade of captain: Provided, That no person shall be appointed in the Army Nurse Corps or the Women's Medical Specialist Corps in a grade higher than the rank (either actual or relative) which such person held during any of the wars in which the United States is now engaged.

SEC. 105. (a) For the purposes specified in subsection (b) hereof, each person appointed pursuant to provisions of this title shall, at the time of her appointment, be credited with whichever is the greater of the following two periods of service: (1) A period of service equal to the number of years, months, and days which such person served on active Federal military service either as a member (including the status of Reserve nurse) of the Army Nurse Corps created by chapter V of the act of July 9, 1918 (40 Stat. 879), as amended, or as a dietitian or physical therapist with the Medical Department of the Army under the provisions of the act of December 22, 1942 (56 Stat. 1072), or in the status of a commissioned officer in the Army of the United States under appointment pursuant to the act of June 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 324); or (2) a period of service determined constructively in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That in computing the total period of active Federal military service each such person honorably discharged or separated from active Federal military service subsequent to May 12, 1945, shall also be credited with the period from the date of her discharge or separation from active Federal military service to the date of her appointment.

(b) The period of service credited to a person as provided in subsection (a) hereof shall be counted and construed as continuous active commissioned service on the active list of the Regular Army for the following two purposes: (1) For the purpose of determining the grade and rank of a person appointed under the provisions of this title, and (2) for the purpose of determining a person's right to promotion subsequent to appointment under the provisions of this title. Except for the foregoing specified purposes, provisions of existing law regarding length of service and benefits accruing therefrom shall not be affected.

SEC. 106. Relative rank among commissioned officers of the Army Nurse Corps and the Women's Medical Specialist Corps, within each corps, and between such officers and other commissioned officers of the Regular Army, shall be determined in the manner now or hereafter prescribed by law for the determination of relative rank among other commissioned officers of the Regular Army. Commissioned officers of each such corps shall not be entitled, by virtue of their rank, to command, except within their respective corps, and over such persons as may be placed under their charge by competent authority, but may be assigned by the Secretary of War to perform such duties as the interests of the service may require.

SEC. 107. (a) Commissioned officers of the Army Nurse Corps and the Women's Medical Specialist Corps, Regular Army, shall, upon completion of the length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of first lieutenant, be promoted to the permanent grade of first lieutenant; commissioned officers of such corps shall, after completing the length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of captain, be promoted to the permanent grade of captain upon satisfactorily passing such examinations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. Promotion to the permanent grade of major shall be by selection, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, from among officers in the grade of captain who have completed the length of service now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers to the grade of major. Promotion to the permanent grade of lieutenant colonel shall be by selection, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, from officers in the permanent grade of major with at least 1 year's service in the grade of major.

(b) The examination for promotion referred to in subsection (a) above shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War and shall be held before a board of three officers designated by the Secretary of War. Should any officer fail to pass such examination, she shall be continued on active duty for a period of 1 year after the date upon which her promotion would normally have occurred, but without being so promoted, and upon the expiration of such year, or such time anterior to the expiration thereof as may be determined by the Secretary of War to be for the best interests of the service, such officer shall undergo such reexamination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War and which shall be held before a board of officers designated by the Secretary of War, none of whom participated in the original examination of the officer concerned. If the officer concerned fails to pass the reexamination, she shall be honorably discharged from the service in the permanent grade then held with severance pay the same as now or hereafter prescribed for officers of the Regular Army separated by reason of not being selected for promotion.

SEC. 108. (a) An officer on the active list of either the Army Nurse Corps or the Women's Medical Specialist Corps, Regular Army, after 20 years' active Federal service in the armed forces of the United States, may upon her request, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, be retired and shall receive retired pay equal to 2½ percent of the base and longevity pay she would receive if serving on active duty in the grade in which retired, multiplied by a number equal to the number of years of such active Federal service: Provided, That in computing the number of years of such service for the purpose of determining the percentage of active-duty pay, and for no other purpose, any fractional part of a year amounting to 6 months or more shall be counted as a complete year: Provided further, That in no event shall such retired pay exceed 75 percent of such base and longevity pay: And provided further, That regardless of the years of service completed, at any time after such an officer shall have attained the age of 50, if her permanent grade is below that of major, or at any time after such an officer shall have attained the age of 55, if her permanent grade is major or higher, she may, at the discretion of the Secretary of War without her consent, be retired and upon such retirement she shall receive retired pay equal to 3 percent of the base and longevity pay she would receive if serving on active duty in the grade in which retired, multiplied by a number equal to the number of years of her active Federal service, but in no event shall such retired pay exceed 75 percent of such base and longevity pay.

(b) Unless entitled to higher retired rank or pay under any provision of law, each commissioned officer who shall have served for 4 years as Chief of the Army Nurse Corps, Regular Army, or as Chief of the Women's Medical Specialist Corps, Regular Army, or as an Assistant Chief of the Women's Medical Specialist Corps, Regular Army, shall upon retirement be retired with the rank held by her while so serving, and shall receive retired pay at the rate prescribed by law, computed on the basis of the base and longevity pay which she would receive if serving on active duty with such rank, and if thereafter recalled to active service, shall be recalled in such rank and shall constitute an additional number therein: Provided, That the commissioned officer first appointed as Chief of the Army Nurse Corps and the commissioned officer first appointed as Chief of the Women's Medical Specialist Corps, pursuant to this act, shall, without limitation as to the time they shall serve in such capacities, upon retirement be retired with the rank held while so serving, and shall receive retired pay at the rate prescribed by law, computed on the basis of the base and longevity pay they would receive if serving on active duty with such rank.

(c) In determining eligibility for retirement and the percentage of active-service pay to be employed in computing the amount of retired pay under any provision of law, each commissioned officer on the active list of the Regular Army who is commissioned in any of the corps established by this act, shall be deemed to have at least the same length of continuous active commissioned service in the Regular Army as any officer junior to her rank in the Medical Department of the Regular Army.

SEC. 109. Except as otherwise specifically provided, all laws now or hereafter applicable to male commissioned officers of the Regular Army, to former male commissioned officers of the Regular Army, and to their dependents and beneficiaries, shall in like cases be applicable respectively to commissioned officers of any of the corps established by this act, Regular Army, to former commissioned officers of any of the corps established by this act, Regular Army, and to their dependents and beneficiaries.

SEC. 110. Except for the purpose of determining a person's grade, rank, and right to promotion in the Regular Army (see section 105 (b) hereof) in computing years of active Federal military service for all purposes of any person, there shall be credited active military service in the Army Nurse Corps and in the Navy Nurse Corps, active military service rendered pursuant to an appointment under the provisions of the act of December 22, 1942 (56 Stat. 1072), and active military service rendered pursuant to an appointment under the act of June 23, 1944 (58 Stat. 324).

SEC. 111. The Secretary of War, under the circumstances and in accordance with regulations prescribed by the President, may terminate the commission of any officer commissioned in any of the corps established by this title.

SEC. 112. Personnel appointed in the Regular Army under the provisions of this act shall be in addition to the numbers of other commissioned officers of the Regular Army now or hereafter prescribed by law.

SEC. 113. (a) Effective on the date of enactment of this act, no further appointment shall be made in the Army Nurse Corps created by chapter V of the act of July 9, 1918 (40 Stat. 879), as amended, and no further appointment shall be made pursuant to the act of December 22, 1942 (56 Stat. 1073), or pursuant to the act of June 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 324). The acceptance of any Regular Army appointment under this act shall operate to vacate any other military or civilian status in or with the Military Establishment theretofore occupied by the appointee except an appointment pursuant to the act of June 22, 1944.

(b) Effective 6 months following the date of enactment of this act, the Army Nurse Corps created by chapter V of the act of July 9, 1918 (40 Stat. 879), as amended, and all offices and appointments therein shall cease to exist: Provided, That this provision shall not affect the rights, benefits, privileges, pay, allowances, gratuities, or leave accrued to a person, her dependents, or beneficiaries by virtue of any laws or regulations in effect prior to the enactment of this act, and where necessary to the full enjoyment of terminal leave, terminal-leave pay, retirement and retired pay, pensions, travel allowance, transportation of dependents and effects, and rights, benefits, privileges, and gratuities to which such person or her dependents have become entitled, such corps, offices, and appointments shall continue to exist but only for such purposes.

SEC. 114. Effective the date of enactment of this act, there shall be established in the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Army of the United States an Army Nurse Corps Section and a Women's Medical Specialist Corps Section.

SEC. 115. Except as otherwise specifically provided, all laws and regulations now or hereafter applicable to commissioned officers and former commissioned officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps, and to their dependents and beneficiaries, shall, in like cases, be applicable, respectively, to commissioned officers and former commissioned officers of the Army Nurse Corps Section and the Women's Medical Specialist Corps Section of the Officers' Reserve Corps, and to their dependents and beneficiaries.

SEC. 116. SEC. 202. There shall be a Director of the Nurse Corps appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General of the Navy, from among the officers of the active list of the Nurse Corps for a term of not more than 4 years, to serve at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Navy. While so serving the Director shall have the rank of captain, shall be entitled to the pay and allowances as are now or may be hereafter prescribed by law for a captain of the Navy, and her regular status as a commissioned officer of the Nurse Corps shall not be disturbed by reason of such appointment.

SEC. 203. All members of the active list of the existing Nurse Corps of the Regular Navy, who, on the effective date of this act, are serving in a temporary rank authorized by present law, may, during a period of not more than 6 months after enactment of this act, be transferred to the Nurse Corps created by this act, and, upon transfer, shall be appointed for temporary service pursuant to, and subject to the limitations of, the act of July 24, 1941 (55 Stat. 603), as now or hereafter amended, to the same rank and with the same precedence held by them on the date of such transfer, and for the purposes of such appointments under the said act, such members of the Nurse Corps shall be considered to be commissioned officers in the Regular Navy. Nurses so transferred, who at the time of such transfer had to their credit leave accrued but not taken, shall not, by reason of such transfer, lose such accrued leave. Prior to the termination of their temporary appointments, the Secretary of the Navy shall appoint a board of not less than three naval officers, who, in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, shall assign running mates to the Nurse Corps officers transferred and appointed for temporary service pursuant to this section, and such officers shall be assigned permanent ranks corresponding to the permanent ranks held by their running mates: Provided, That no officer of the Nurse Corps shall be assigned a permanent rank above that of commander.

SEC. 204. Except as provided in sections 203 and 211 of this title, appointments to the grade of nurse in the Regular Navy shall be with the rank of ensign, and each such appointment shall be subject to revocation by the Secretary of the Navy until such time as the appointee is advanced to the rank of lieutenant (junior grade). Officers whose appointments are so revoked shall be discharged from the service without advanced pay. SEC. 205. Officers of the Navy Nurse Corps shall have authority in medical and sanitary matters and all other work within the line of their professional duties in and about naval hospitals and other activities of the Medical Department of the Navy next after officers of the Medical Corps and the Dental Corps of the Navy. They shall exercise such military authority as may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That they shall not be eligible for the exercise of command.

SEC. 206. (a) All provisions of law now existing or hereafter enacted relating to the advancement in rank of officers of the staff corps of the Navy, except those provisions relating to the same subject matter provided for in the following subsections of this section, shall be construed to include officers of the Nurse Corps.

(b) Paragraph 2, section 16, of the act of June 10, 1926 (44 Stat. 723); section 17 of the act of June 10, 1926 (44 Stat. 724); and section 4 of the act of August 5, 1935 (49 Stat. 530), shall not apply to officers of the Nurse Corps established by this title.

(c) Section 3 of the act of June 10, 1926, is hereby amended by inserting the following proviso after the colon which appears after the word "mate" in line 17, paragraph 4, thereof, on page 718, volume 44, Statutes at Large: "Provided further, That an officer of the Nurse Corps recommended for advancement to the rank of commander in the approved report of a selection board shall be eligible for advancement to such rank when a vacancy occurs therein, and when so advanced such officer shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of the rank of commander only from the date of the vacancy:".

(d) Section 16 of the act of June 10, 1926, is hereby amended by striking out the period as it appears after the word "him" in line 7, paragraph 1, thereof, on page 723, volume 44, Statutes at Large, substituting a colon therefor, and adding the following proviso: "Provided, That a selection board to recommend officers of the Nurse Corps for advancement to the rank of commander shall be convened only if there exists a vacancy in such rank or if the Secretary of the Navy estimates or determines that a vacancy will occur in the ensuing 12-month period."

(e) Boards for selection of Nurse Corps officers for recommendation for advancement to the ranks of commander, lieutenant commander, and lieutenant shall be composed of not less than six nor more than nine officers not below the rank of captain on the active or retired list of the Medical Corps: Provided, That in case there is not a sufficient number of officers of the Medical Corps legally or physically qualified to serve on the selection board as herein provided, officers of the line of the active list of the rank of captain may be detailed to duty on such board to constitute the required membership.

SEC. 207. (a) All provisions of law now existing or hereafter enacted relating to retired officers of the staff corps of the Navy and to the retirement or separation from the active list of such officers, except those provisions relating to the same subject matter provided for in the following subsections of this section, shall be construed to include officers of the Nurse Corps.

Nothing contained in this subsection shall be construed to prohibit the transfer, under section 203 hereof, to the Nurse Corps created by this act of such member of the Nurse Corps, which exceeded prior to the enactment of this act, as may have reached the retirement ages specified herein prior to such transfer.

(c) An officer of the Navy Nurse Corps, who may be retired for any reason while serving as Director of such corps or subsequent to service as Director while serving in a lower rank, may, in the discretion of the President if she shall have served 2½ years or more as Director, be placed on the retired list in the rank held by her as Director.

In any case where, as determined by the Secretary of the Navy, any such officer has not performed satisfactory duty in the highest rank held by her while on active duty, she shall be placed on the retired list with the next lower rank in which she has served but not lower than her permanent rank.

(e) An officer of the Nurse Corps placed on the retired list in her permanent rank pursuant to subsection (b) of this section shall receive retired pay at the rate of 2½ percent of the active-duty pay to which entitled at the time of retirement, multiplied by the number of years for which entitled to credit in the computation of her active-duty pay, not to exceed a total of 75 percent of said active-duty pay.

(f) An officer of the Nurse Corps retired by reason of physical disability incurred in the line of duty shall, if placed on the retired list in a rank higher than her permanent rank, receive retired pay equal to 75 percent of active-duty pay to which she would be entitled if serving, at the time of retirement, on active duty in the rank in which placed upon the retired list.

(g) An officer of the Nurse Corps retired other than by reason of physical disability incurred in the line of duty shall, if placed on the retired list in a rank higher than her permanent rank, receive retired pay equal to 2½ percent of the active-duty pay to which she would be entitled if serving, at the time of retirement, on active duty in the rank in which placed upon the retired list, multiplied by the number of years for which entitled to credit in the computation of her active-duty pay, not to exceed a total of 75 percent of said active-duty pay.

(h) In any instance in which retired pay is computed as prescribed in subsections (e) and (g) of this section, a fractional year of 6 months or more shall be considered a full year in computing the number of years by which the rate of 2½ percent is multiplied.

(i) The number of years service to be credited to officers of the Navy Nurse Corps in determining their eligibility for voluntary retirement shall be based on the total of all active service, either under an appointment or contract or as a commissioned officer in the Nurse Corps of the Army or Navy, or the reserve components thereof and all active service in the Nurse Corps or the Nurse Corps Reserve abolished by this act shall, for this purpose only, be regarded as commissioned service in the Navy or the reserve components thereof, as the case may be.

(j) Retired officers of the Navy Nurse Corps shall be authorized to bear the title, and, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, to wear the uniform of the rank with which retired.

SEC. 208. (a) All provisions of law relating to pay, leave, money allowances for subsistence, and rental of quarters, mileage and other travel allowances, or other allowances, benefits, or emoluments, of male officers of the Navy, except those provisions relating to the same subject matter provided for in subsection (b) of this section, are hereby made applicable to officers of the Nurse Corps: Provided, That the husbands of officers of the Navy Nurse Corps shall not be considered dependents of such officers unless they are in fact dependent on their wives for their chief support, and the children of such officers shall not be considered dependents unless their father is dead or they are in fact dependent on their mother for their chief support: Provided further, That officers of the Nurse Corps may be subsisted in hospital messes in accordance with section 17 (a) of the act of August 2, 1946 (Public Law 604, 79th Cong., 2d sess.), and such officers may be assigned quarters in naval hospitals under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe.

Mr. VINSON (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to speak on the bill.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, if my request is granted, it does not preclude anyone from offering an amendment anywhere in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Not if the gentleman includes that in his request.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, my request is in the interest of saving time and the reading of a bill containing some 18 or 20 pages over which there is no controversy.

The SPEAKER. The Members would not be precluded from offering amendments if the gentleman will include that in the request.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I include that as a part of the request and also that the bill may be open for amendment at any point.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, there is no question but what the women of the country have demonstrated their ability to perform nursing services and other activities in connection with the Army and the Navy. I do want to point out to my colleagues, however, something that I have called to your attention before on several occasions, and that is the ratio, not only of nurses but doctors, to military personnel.

This bill calls for 6 nurses for each 1,000 enlisted personnel in the Army and the Navy. The medical men have about the same ratio. Well, now, in areas of combat zones that may not be enough. The war is now over. The military personnel in our Army and Navy consists of healthy young men. The idea of having 6 nurses to every 1,000 men in the military is out of joint. It is not necessary to have 6 physicians or nurses for every 1,000 enlisted men. The ratio of physicians to civilian population in this country is about 1 physician to every 1,500 people. On that ratio the Army and the Navy would have about 9 physicians for every 1,500; in other words, we have in our civilian population men, women, and children, and old folks, who need the services of the nurses and the doctors just as much as our military needs them. I realize that this bill calls for a minimum strength of not less than 2,558. We should have a permanent Nurse Corps. I think it is a good thing, and we need it in the Army and the Navy, but I am fearful that the military authorities will then proceed to set up 6 nurses to every 1,000 enlisted men. This ratio for nurses and doctors is far too high in peacetime.

I hear from many medical men in the army of occupation. They tell me that they have about seven physicians to every 100 enlisted men.

These medical men sit around doing very little. The enlisted men are healthy and there is no need for so many doctors for so few men. In your community and mine there are old people, women and children, who need the attention of physicians. The need for nurses and doctors is acute in the country; why should the military have so many? I think the Nurses' Corps is essential, but I say to you as I have told the military committees before, that having 6 doctors and 6 nurses to every 1,000 enlisted personnel in the Army and the Navy is out of joint and you ought to do something about the problem. There ought to be a revision of those things, because if they go ahead now and take 6 nurses for every 1,000 enlisted men they are going to strip your community and my community of needed nursing personnel that are so sorely needed at this time. I hope the military authorities will see fit to get along, perhaps, with two to the thousand.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that we have a very heavy load in both Army and Navy hospitals today, approximately 70,000 sick soldiers and sailors?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Yes; I understand that. I understand they are not all being taken care of by Army nurses either. They are taken care of by civilian nursing personnel. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The bill provides for only 6 per thousand of enlisted personnel and officer strength of both the Army and the Navy, but the testimony before the Committee on Armed Services was that we have nearly 1,000,000 dependents of Navy enlisted and officer personnel to take care of in hospitals of the country, a million outside the enlisted personnel.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Of course, if the Army and Navy are going to start in on a program of taking care of all the civilian personnel of the country, then we are going to need more nurses. I do not understand that the function of this bill is that they are going to take care of civilian personnel. It says in the bill that they shall have 6 members thereof to every 1,000 persons of the authorized strength of the Regular Army. That is military personnel.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Under the present law the Navy and Army must take care of certain dependents of our military and naval personnel.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Is it in the bill?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. It is part of the general law, and this bill provides only the ratio of nurses to enlisted strength.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I still say 6 to 1,000 is too many for the enlisted personnel. Even with 1,000,000 dependents it means a ratio of 3 to every 1,000, and that is 200 percent more than we have for civilians.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. POWELL: On page 2, line 25, after "United States", insert the following: "irrespective of race, color, creed, national origin, or ancestry."

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, let me read page 2, subsection (c), as it is sought to be amended:

Commissioned officers of the Army Nurse Corps, Regular Army, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from female citizens of the United States irrespective of race, color, creed, national origin, or ancestry, who have achieved the age of 21 years.

I think that is a reasonable amendment. As I said a few moments ago, it is one we all agreed on 2 years ago. On March 6 it was proposed by our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN]. I note in the RECORD that my colleague and friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER] said, "I commend the gentleman for his excellent statement." As I look through the RECORD before me I note that the motion went through unanimously 2 years ago. That means all of us voted for it. There was not a yea and nay vote on it. It was a voice vote. When the bill came to final passage, everyone except 42 voted in favor of the bill with that clause in it. I see that our minority leader of this committee [Mr. RIVERS] was not present that day, so we can excuse him, but others were here and I am looking at you face to face, and you voted for it.

Now, what is the objection? I am sure there is no objection by the Republicans, because this motion is identical to the one presented by your distinguished Member [Mr. BROWN of Ohio], and you all voted for it 2 years ago. The Republicans were a minority then; you are a majority now. If this amendment is defeated, it will be because of the Republican Party; you control the majority of the votes.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWELL. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHAFER. What is the purpose of the amendment? Is there discrimination now in the service?

Mr. POWELL. Yes; there is.

Mr. SHAFER. In what instance?

Mr. POWELL. If the gentleman will permit me to finish my preliminary statement, I will have covered that matter, and then I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman again for a question.

Mr. Speaker, at that time, 2 years ago, we had about 100,000 Negro men serving in the United States Navy without a single Negro nurse in charge—not a Negro nurse was in the Navy. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] brought that out. I have the facts with me. In other words, we had Negro men being waited on and taken care of when they were wounded or ill by white nurses. We needed Negro nurses then. We need them now. We do not know if we may need them next month or next year. We do not know when another world war will be upon us. This is a perfectly logical and perfectly reasonable proposition and it is something that has already been passed on.

When Mr. BROWN's amendment was passed, the very next week the United States Navy brought in a token—a handful, and when I say a handful, I really mean a handful—less than 10 Negro nurses. Of course, they are in the service now, it is true. But what guarantee have we that this policy will obtain in years to come unless we write it into the law?

I know there is a group of my colleagues here who have certain peculiar responsibilities. I recognize these responsibilities. I am talking to you gentlemen now, as I have talked to you off the floor and have talked to you face to face. We have come to know each other rather well.

This is the same thing you passed in the Selective Service Act. It is the same thing that obtains in your home towns right now. There is not a hospital in your home town, wherever you may come from, where you do not have Negro nurses in the Negro wards. But I know your towns. I have been there. I have talked to you today and in days gone by about this. It is a perfectly logical, American, sane approach. It is guaranteeing a policy for the future to make sure that when the next crisis comes we will be able to use, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] "9,000 accredited graduate Negro nurses." That is his own language as he spoke on March 6, 1945.

We do not know when another war will be upon us. It may be sooner than we think and not as far away as we hope. We want to be ready. We want to have every American citizen who is qualified to do his best.

Again I repeat, if this amendment is defeated it will be the fault of the Republicans.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOFFMAN to the amendment offered by Mr. POWELL: At the end of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] strike out the period and add "membership or nonmembership in any labor organization."

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment to the amendment is not germane. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York merely deals with the question of race, creed, or color, and national origin. The amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan deals with an entirely different subject and therefore is not germane to the subject dealt with in the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan deals with the question of membership in labor unions.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] provides generally that appointment in the Nurse Corps shall be made irrespective of race, creed, color, or national origin.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] simply adds an additional category.

In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment is germane, and the Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for the purpose of propounding a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, with the right to the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, no one is responsible because he has a certain color or lack of color, because he comes from a certain race of people. Folks are responsible for adhering to a certain creed. So it seems as though, if the purpose of the amendment is to prevent discrimination, it should include in its terms membership or nonmembership in a labor organization, and provide that no nurse should be deprived of a job because she belonged or did not belong to a labor organization.

If it be said that an amendment of this kind has no place in the bill which has to do with the personnel of the Army and the Navy, it need only be remembered that all through the last war the Navy discriminated against men and women who did not belong to a labor organization. I can show you the records where the Navy ordered the discharge of men who were engaged in making munitions of war because they had not paid their union dues. They might have had sons or daughters in the armed services; they might have wanted to work in the factory to supply those sons and daughters with the weapons with which to fight, but the Navy of the United States discriminated against them because they did not belong to a union and said they must be discharged; and when they were discharged the Navy said they could not work until they paid up. Now, what kind of a situation is that? Do you approve of it?

In the third area, the Army Commander of the district told his truck drivers who were carrying supplies to soldiers not to go through the picket line until they had obtained the consent of the union boss. Our soldiers, our sailors, our men and our women were fighting and winning over the enemy abroad, on the battlefields all over the country, but here at home the Army and Navy backed up and took orders from the union boss.

In Detroit, away back in 1939, for 42 days the Navy let a picket line hold possession of finished materials, and of the Navy's own patterns which they needed in the Philadelphia Navy Yard rather than cross a picket-line. Is there any reason why, if we are to prevent discrimination, we should not go the whole way; we should not also prevent discrimination because some American man or woman does not choose to cross the hand of some collector of tribute working in behalf of an organization outside of the Government which demands that they must pay in order to work in defense of the country? Let us outlaw the closed shop.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. This amendment as originally offered is in the exact language of the first plank in the Communist platform, as published the other day in a local paper. Now, suppose we are approaching war, which may be a possibility, shall we say you cannot question the national origin of an applicant?

Mr. HOFFMAN. In the President's message of yesterday it was suggested that we stop communism at the frontiers of Turkey and Greece. I say stop it here in America. I recall the day—it is popular now to talk against communism—I recall the day when Martin Dies stood in the well of this House fighting communism, yet these papers in the cities abused and misused him. I recall the day when Mrs. Roosevelt—bless your dear hearts—walked over to the big caucus room with her Communist friends in an effort to aid them as they were about to testify before a committee charged with exposing Communists.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from Maine is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I think the Members ought to be here to listen to what the gentlewoman from Maine has to say. I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and forty-seven Members are present, a quorum.

The gentlewoman from Maine is recognized.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, long hearings were held on this bill, H. R. 1943, and much testimony was given, none, however, on this subject of Negro nurses. No amendment was offered in committee on this subject.

There is not any objection, as I see it, to the intent of the amendment, but in my opinion it would serve no purpose. It is not necessary.

Approximately 600 Negro nurses served with distinction during the war. Only this week military officials told me of the excellent service given by these Negro nurses and that they are taking all who apply and can qualify. Inquiries from Hampton Institute, Virginia as to opportunities for graduate nurses have been made and the Navy has replied that all Negro nurses who can qualify physically and professionally will be given the same consideration as all other applicants. From this it is reported there will be a group of recent graduates from this Institute indoctrinated soon at Bethesda. Of course, there are many nurses who do not meet the physical requirements regardless of color. I do not want discrimination. My record is clear on this. I feel that these two amendments that have been offered are not needed. In reference to the last one offered, the Labor Committee has jurisdiction of that matter and is considering amendments to labor laws. So far as the first one is concerned, Negro nurses are already in the service and will continue to be so long as they are qualified, therefore such an amendment as has been offered is unnecessary. Those nurses are being promoted as are all nurses.

Mr. Speaker, there must be nurses and there must be nursing whether there is an emergency or not. The Army and Navy testified that without this legislation they cannot care for the boys who are in the service and who are ill now. This legislation does not cost any more than we are paying or have been paying since 1944.

There is nothing new in this bill, H. R. 1943. It simply continues what we already have. It places the nurses on a permanent status rather than on a temporary basis. Nurses are serving under temporary legislation. There is no assurance as to length of service or retirement privileges, so the nurses are looking around for something better. Without this legislation we are facing complete dissolution of the temporary Nurse Corps.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the passage of this bill without additional amendments.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. POWELL. I would like to ask the gentlewoman what guaranties she has that what is beginning now without law will take place 10, 15, or 20 years from now? This did not begin in the service until 2 years ago when we passed an amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN]. Twenty-six years ago our Navy had Negro commissioned officers, then changed its policy. When World War II came on we were caught and did not have them. During the war period we had to train them all over again, change the policy back again. My amendment would merely guarantee this policy.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. As the gentleman knows, I have worked with the Navy and Army a long time. I have confidence that the military officials will continue the excellent service that has been rendered by the nurses.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks data from the Army and the Navy.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1947.

Memorandum for Hon. MARGARET CHASE SMITH.

Subject: Utilization of Negro nurses in the Army during World War II.

According to the records of this office the first Negro nurses were appointed in April 1941, when 12 were assigned as second lieutenants, and from that time forward, with the exception of a few months, Negro nurses were given appointments throughout the procurement period until approximately 600 Negro nurses had been appointed in the corps, the peak strength at one time being 537 nurses.

In addition to being assigned as individuals to stations in the United States, three all-Negro units were organized and sent overseas for duty, one to Liberia, one to England, and one to the South Pacific.

In the early part of the war a policy was adopted to utilize the Negro nurses in the care of Negro patients, and they were more or less segregated as far as quarters and messing was concerned. Later, however, they were assigned indiscriminately and worked along with white nurses in the care of both white and Negro patients and have participated in the same messes and occupied quarters along with white nurses. They have been promoted according to War Department policy along with all other members of the corps.

The Negro units assigned to oversea service received for treatment white patients as well as Negro. For a time these Negro units were commanded by white officers and the nursing service was directed by white nurses. After a period of training in Army Administration the units were placed under the command of a Negro medical officer with a Negro chief nurse as director of nursing service.

There are at present 90 Negro nurses in the Army on active duty. They are in grades from second lieutenant to captain.

It is believed that the majority of nurses who were separated have been separated at their own request except during a period when demobilization directives from the War Department made it imperative to release nurses.

In other words, it is believed that every effort has been made to afford Negro nurses an opportunity to advance in the corps along with white nurses. We are pleased to report that on the whole they have rendered a very excellent service and have adapted very satisfactorily to the military situation.

NORMAN T. KIRK,
Major General,
The Surgeon General.

The Navy Department reports that all together only 16 Negro nurses applied for service during the war. Six of these qualified and were offered appointments. Four of the six accepted the appointments, one changed her mind and declined, and the other failed on final physical examination. Two of the four married while in the service. According to regulations, except during the war, married nurses are not retained. One separated by reason of points in August 1946, and the remaining one was given extension to June 1948, and it is expected she will be given permanent status if she desires it when this bill becomes law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from Maine has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. POWELL) there were—ayes 47, noes 187.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I offer two perfecting amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mrs. SMITH of Maine:

On page 6, line 15, strike out "is presently" and insert "was."

Page 7, line 19, strike out "is now" and insert "was."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I will not take the full 5 minutes, but I did want this time just to ask the gentlewoman from Maine a question. I have not had time to read all the hearings. For the RECORD I would like to inquire of the gentlewoman from Maine whether any consideration was given to recognizing medical and psychiatric social workers in this proposed medical specialist staff, which, according to the bill, includes physical therapist and occupational therapist sections.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Nothing was heard on that subject. Physical therapists and occupational therapists were the only ones included at the moment.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. It is my understanding—and if I am wrong, I hope the gentlewoman will correct me—that the requirements for medical and psychiatric social workers, both of which are employed by the Army and the Navy and the Veterans' Administration, are fully as high as the groups recognized in this bill, in that they require a postgraduate course in order to be recognized as medical and psychiatric social workers, and I was wondering whether there was any reason other than that the associations have not asked for them that they were left out.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. The subject was not discussed in any of the hearings, so there was no evidence presented.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Then the responsibility lies with their own organizations, is that correct?

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, that subject at the present time is being taken care of by civilian personnel. There are a very small number involved, and there is very little need of them in the corps because of such a small number.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I understand that this is being given consideration by the various groups that the gentleman speaks of. I know it is true, insofar as those groups are concerned, in relation to their being taken into the Veterans' Administration medical service. I think you will probably find that that is true with the Army and Navy also.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I am very sure the bill will pass. There is a tremendous interest in it. The work of the nurses is beyond praise, and this affords permanent appreciation of it. As the Army and the Navy have both asked for this, I think there can be no doubt about its unanimous passage.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I agree with the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] that this is a very meritorious bill and will undoubtedly have the support of an overwhelming majority of the House. In my opinion, however, it would have been a much better bill if the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] had been adopted. It may be true that at the present time the Navy is not discriminating against colored nurses, but the day may come when, due to an oversupply of nurses or some admiral with certain prejudices, discrimination may again be indulged in. I imagine all of us are influenced at times by certain of our own experiences. For the past 20 years I have employed a colored laundress. I have seen her two baby girls grow up. Today one of them is attending college here in the District of Columbia, while the older sister is taking postgraduate work at Yale University, having completed her nurse's training course. These two girls have worked their way through college with what little assistance their mother could provide by working as a laundress day by day. The Navy could certainly use to good advantage the services of this very capable and intelligent colored nurse. If we ever find that the Navy is discriminating on the basis of race, creed, or color, I hope the Congress will speedily amend this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

House Resolution 139 was laid on the table.

DOMESTIC RUBBER PRODUCTION

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 144, Rept. No. 144), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 118) to strengthen the common defense by maintaining an adequate domestic rubber-producing industry. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that today, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

RENEWAL OF EXPIRING FIVE-YEAR LEVEL-PREMIUM TERM POLICIES

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 138 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 1327) to amend existing law to provide privilege of renewing expiring 5-year level-premium term policies for another 5-year period. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this resolution would make in order the immediate consideration of H. R. 1327, a bill to amend existing law to allow veterans to renew their 5-year level-premium term insurance policies for another 5-year period. Five-year level-term insurance for veterans was first authorized by Congress in 1926. Since then there have been three laws renewing the privilege for periods of 5 years each. A veteran can carry term insurance for a total of 20 years under existing law. Passage of this bill would permit veterans to carry their term insurance for a total of 25 years. Twelve thousand eight hundred and twenty-one veterans have renewed their term insurance policies each time the law was extended. Six thousand one hundred and sixty-one have renewed it 3 times; 7,213, twice; and 10,998 obtained their term insurance under the law passed about 5 years ago. In all, there are 37,195 veterans holding this type of Government insurance policy. This bill extends for another 5 years the privilege of renewing their policy.

H. R. 1327 was reported unanimously by the Committee on Veterans Affairs, and the resolution making its immediate consideration in order was unanimously reported by the Rules Committee. One hour of general debate was considered sufficient on the bill, as it is a nonpartisan measure, and since little or no opposition is likely to arise. The bill may be amended on the floor under the 5-minute rule. One motion to recommit is also provided by House Resolution 138 should any opposition to the bill arise.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a letter I received from a constituent and which letter, I believe, evidences an outstanding example of the practice of the Golden Rule and the Christian ethic.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

FIVE-YEAR LEVEL-PREMIUM TERM POLICIES

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1327) to amend existing law to provide privilege of renewing expiring 5-year level-premium term policies for another 5-year period.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1327, with Mr. RIZLEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I was out of the Chamber when the rule was taken up. How much time is provided for general debate and how is it divided?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is not to exceed 1 hour, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, H. R. 1327 pertains to United States Government life insurance issued on the 5-year level-premium term plan. It was introduced at the request of the American Legion, and has the indorsement of all the veterans' organizations. Since the first policies issued, the Congress has granted three renewals for periods of 5 years each, the last act being that of May 14, 1942, Public Law 556, Seventy-seventh Congress. Because the fourth 5-year period is expiring in many cases in 1947, this bill is necessary in order to provide an additional 5-year period of renewal. The Committee on Veterans' Affairs reported this bill unanimously.

Besides the precedent set up by Congress in permitting the continuance of this type of insurance, it must be remembered that the premiums charged on such insurance increase to that for the attained age upon the renewal for an additional 5-year period. Further, this type of policy applies to World War I veterans and a smaller number of peacetime veterans prior to October 8, 1940, when the National Service Life Insurance Act was approved.

It is the opinion of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs that the privilege of renewing this type of policy at present should not be denied any veterans desiring to so renew. The committee takes the position that veterans who desire the protection of level-premium term insurance for themselves and their families during the years of the immediate future at a cost lower than that required to convert their policies to a permanent plan should not be denied the right to continue their term insurance. Those whose fourth 5-year period expires, for example, in 1947, and who have attained the age of 55 at time of renewal for a fifth period under the bill, will be required to pay a monthly premium of $17.60 on a $10,000 policy during such fifth 5-year period. If required to convert to an ordinary life policy at the attained age of 55, the monthly premium on a $10,000 policy would be $38.20 during the life of the policy.

As of December 31, 1946, there were in force 37,195 policies on the 5-year level-premium term plan; 12,821 were in their fourth 5-year period. As their policies expire, the bill authorizes renewal for a fifth 5-year period. As of the same date, there were 10,998 such policies in their first 5-year period, 7,215 in their second, and 6,161 in their third. Renewal for a fifth 5-year period in the latter cases would not take place until expiration of the fourth 5-year period.

The bill affords protection to those who have not converted and whose policies expire between January 24, 1947, and 5 months after the date of enactment of this bill. This is similar to the protection afforded by previous similar acts.

The Veterans' Administration has stated that it would be impossible to estimate the cost of this proposed legislation. The only additional cost to the Government, however, would be in those cases where the insured has a service-connected disability and it is later determined that death or permanent and total disability was due to the service-connected disability or the extra hazards of war. It should be pointed out, however, that the Government pays for the extra hazards, due to service, no matter what plan of insurance is involved.

The fact that out of the 37,195 policies on this plan, 26,197 are in the second, third, or fourth periods, and 12,821 are in the fourth period, makes it readily apparent that they must be good risks. Taking the group which would be immediately relieved by this bill, it should be remembered that they have been continuing their insurance in force by payment of premiums for 20 years, and therefore certainly must be considered to have been excellent risks.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that that request be made in the House.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, and so far as the Members on our side are concerned, we are not opposed to this legislation. It is the same legislation which came out of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation several times during the years that I was chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the last proviso of the first paragraph of section 301, World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended (47 Stat. 334; U. S. C., title 38, sec. 512), is hereby amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That at the expiration of any 5-year period a 5-year level-premium term policy may be renewed for a second, third, fourth, or fifth 5-year period at the premium rate for the attained age without medical examination; and in case the 5-year period of any such policy shall have expired between January 24, 1947, and the expiration of 5 months after the date of the enactment of this amendment to this amendatory proviso and the policy has not been continued in another form of Government insurance such policy may be renewed as of the date of its expiration on the same conditions upon payment of the back premiums within 5 months after such date of enactment; and the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall cause notice to be mailed to the holder of any such policy of the provisions of this amendment to this amendatory proviso."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 3, strike out the word "last" and insert the word "second."

Page 1, line 4, strike out "47 Stat. 334" and insert "by the act of May 14, 1942."

Page 1, line 8, strike out "level premium term" and insert "level-premium term."

Page 1, line 9, strike out "third, fourth," and insert "or third or fourth."

On page 2, line 2, insert the word "fourth" before the word "5-year."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RIZLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 1327 to amend existing law to provide privilege of renewing expiring 5-year level-premium term policies for another 5-year period, pursuant to House Resolution 138, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this time to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana what we may expect in the way of a program for next week.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, it is our plan to call the Consent Calendar on next Monday. There are several bills on that calendar which should be disposed of.

Then we propose to call up House Joint Resolution 118, which is a bill from the Committee on Armed Services dealing with the matter of continuation of rubber control. If that bill is not concluded on Monday, and it seems now it may not be concluded on Monday, it will be continued on Tuesday.

Also on Tuesday we will call the Private Calendar.

It is our plan to adjourn from Tuesday until Thursday.

Thursday it is proposed to call up a bill from the Committee on Banking and Currency, House Resolution 2413, to amend the Federal Reserve Act. Also if a rule is granted on the bill we shall try to call up House Resolution 1366, to facilitate the procurement of supplies and services by the War and Navy Departments.

Friday we propose to call up a bill which is to be reported, as I understand, from the Banking and Currency Committee, dealing with the matter of the extension of sugar control.

Mr. RAYBURN. I thank the gentleman.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

SUSPENSION OF NAVIGATION AND VESSEL INSPECTION LAWS AS APPLIED TO VESSELS OPERATED BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 131, which makes in order the consideration of the bill H. R. 1240.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1240) to provide for the suspension of navigation and vessel inspection laws, as applied to vessels operated by the War Department, upon the termination of title V, Second War Powers Act, 1942, as amended. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same back to the House with such amendments as shall have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the consideration of H. R. 1240, a bill to provide for the suspension of navigation- and vessel-inspection laws, as applied to vessels operated by the War Department, upon the termination of title V, Second War Powers Act, 1942, as amended.

This is an open rule allowing 1 hour of general debate, at the conclusion of which the bill will be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. The rule also provides for one motion to recommit. There should be no opposition to this rule. This legislation has been requested by the President, and, I understand, was reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries with only one dissenting vote. This bill is necessary due to the fact the Second War Powers Act expires on March 31, and it is desired to continue certain powers contained therein beyond that date.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to explain the bill in detail. This is one of two bills reported by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee which extend powers contained in the Second War Powers Act. Both waive compliance with navigation laws for certain ships flying the American flag. This bill covers only those vessels operated by the War Department. These vessels cannot comply with present high safety standards, and it is proposed to suspend these inspection laws until December 31, 1947. Under the authority of the War Powers Act the President has waived these navigation and inspection laws. The War Department needs these vessels to carry displaced persons, to repatriate others, and to carry troops. Many months in dry dock would be required to refit these ships to meet the requirements set for passenger ships. Many of these ships were built as cargo vessels. They have no sprinkler systems in case of fire. They are equipped with only a minimum of lifeboats. However, no other passenger ships are available and these vessels must be used for the purposes indicated. The committee has pointed out that they are extremely reluctant to pass any legislation authorizing even a temporary lowering of the standards of safety at sea, but the present urgent need of these substandard vessels by the War Department makes this legislation necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Mr. Speaker, under the Second War Powers Act the Congress provided that—

> The head of each department or agency responsible for the administration of the navigation and vessel-inspection laws is directed to waive compliance with such laws upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War to the extent deemed necessary in the conduct of the war by the officer making the request.

Please note that this is a mandatory provision. Compliance with the laws must be waived when requested by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy. It compels the Commandant of the Coast Guard, who is responsible for the enforcement of navigation and vessel-inspection laws in other than public vessels, to grant such waivers as may be requested, even though he thinks such action inadvisable.

Undoubtedly this was wise legislation for the period of the war—but the war is over and we should be getting back to a peacetime status once again.

The Secretary of the Navy has not made any request for a continuation of vessel inspection law waivers after March 31, 1947, and it is therefore assumed that the Navy will not require such waivers. However, in the event the Navy should find a waiver needed in some isolated case it will be possible for such waiver to be granted in the discretion of the Commandant of the Coast Guard, provided House Joint Resolution 76, which will be considered after this bill has been acted upon, is enacted into law.

The Secretary of War has requested that he be granted authority to waive compliance with navigation and inspection laws, insofar as they pertain to vessels operated by the Army, until January 1, 1947, and it is the purpose of this bill to vest that authority in the Secretary of War in a somewhat more restricted sense than requested by him. This is brought about by the amendments suggested which, as you will note, authorize the granting of specific waivers only to vessels for which such waivers have been requested.

It is well to note here that the Army operates two distinct classes of ships; that is, public vessels and nonpublic vessels. Public vessels are covered by specific legislation and need not comply with vessel inspection and safety laws set forth for the operation of the merchant marine. However, as the safety standards required by our laws have been deemed advisable by Congress and have been enacted to provide the greatest safety for those traveling at sea, the Army should comply with these laws insofar as possible in its public vessels. I am glad to say that I am informed by the representatives of the War Department that it is the intention of that Department to bring all ships under its jurisdiction and operated as personnel carriers into full conformity with the vessel inspection and safety rules of the United States just as soon as money becomes available and time permits. A reasonable amount of money will be required to accomplish this end, and I urge that it be granted when requested as we in Congress owe the safety which will be achieved thereby to American citizens who must travel upon public vessels of the Army—we owe to them the same safety that they might expect if traveling on passenger ships operated by private interests under the American flag.

Nonpublic vessels operated under the jurisdiction of the Army are subject to all of the vessel inspection and safety requirements which are applicable to ships under the American flag engaged in passenger traffic and it is to these ships that the present proposed legislation will apply.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of this rule so we may thoroughly discuss the merits of the issues presented in H. R. 1240.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. REEVES].

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a letter and a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in calling up H. R. 1240 and House Joint Resolution 76, which will follow, I am frank to say that I do so with a great deal of trepidation and with my fingers crossed. I am very grateful to my colleagues who, seemingly, because of the prompt action taken heretofore on other legislation we have brought before you, have such a high regard for the integrity and the seriousness with which the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries attack the various problems that are brought before us.

Very frankly, I personally do not like either of these two bills. I have grave misgivings about both of them. I regret that both of them carry my name, but they were introduced as a matter of emergency. H. R. 1240 was introduced at the request of the Secretary of War, and House Joint Resolution 76 was introduced at the request of the President in his message to the Congress on February 3, asking that we extend title V of the Second War Powers Act for 1 year.

Now, when I say I am fearful of these two bills, I say so because any time you tamper with safety standards—and the safety standards of the merchant marine under our laws are the most severe in the world—you are tampering with human life and the safety of human life. So, I do not like it. But, on the other hand, we have in effect a shotgun at our heads in the request for enactment of both of these bills. We have a great many people overseas that have to be transported back here. We have troops overseas that have to be transported to these shores. We have others who have to go abroad, and we simply do not have a passenger-carrying merchant marine afloat today that meets our safety standards that can take care of those people.

I am going to elaborate on the numbers of them when we get into the discussion of the bills themselves. But I say to you Members of the House that when the Army is operating ships designed for cargo carrying, and which meet all of our safety requirements for that purpose, and when you find it necessary to convert them into temporary troop transports, on which, in addition to troops, they are carrying women and children, the wives and families of our troops, overseas, and when they have lifeboat capacity for approximately 900 people and are carrying a total of 2,300, I think that that is not justified in peacetime, now or at any other time. Yet that is the testimony of the War Department.

I have a letter from a general which I shall include in the RECORD at this point:

MARCH 12, 1947.

Hon. FRED BRADLEY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BRADLEY: Confirming my telephone conversation with you this date, I would like to advise you on current Army practices regarding safety-at-sea observance on dependent-carrying vessels.

The current policy of the Transportation Corps is to sail no vessel in which the lifeboat capacity is not adequate to accommodate all members of the crew and all women and children. Further, by "lifeboat capacity" is meant that actually certified by a United States Coast Guard representative.

I hope that this information will be of value to you and your committee.

Sincerely,

PAUL F. YOUNT,
Brigadier General,
Assistant Chief of Transportation.

I talked to the general last night, and he said he knew that I was going to introduce an amendment today to put an end to that practice, and he assured me last night that they were not carrying people beyond their lifeboat capacity. Captain BRADLEY inspected some of these ships just a week ago, or nearly a week ago, and he called our attention to the fact that 2,300 people were carried, with a lifeboat capacity for 900, and yet, as I understood the general last night, he said that they had stopped that practice now. He sent me a letter today in which he said that they are not carrying an excessive number of women and children beyond their lifeboat capacity.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. But I say to you that maybe 1,000 additional soliders or 1,500 of them cast afloat on the North Atlantic today on life rafts can drown just as easily as any women or children. But the Army shrugs its shoulders at them—they are ordered to so travel.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. When wives and children join their families in Germany, are they traveling on boats that do not have adequate lifeboat capacity or other safety requirements?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. According to the general's letter, there is adequate lifeboat capacity for the women and children and crew members, but there may be 1,500 troops on board for which there is no lifeboat capacity.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield to my beloved friend from California, the former ranking member of the committee.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee a question which has been asked me many times. Is it the intention of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to summon before the committee the members of the Civil Aeronautics Board and demand from them the reason why they discriminate against the American merchant marine in favor of foreign competitors by denying the right to American shippers to operate overseas air lines parallel to their present surface shipping routes?

I should like to know also if the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries intends to ascertain from the members of the Civil Aeronautics Board why they arrange landing places on American soil for our foreign competitors while at the same time they deny this right to American shipping companies.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I am very glad my friend from California brought up that matter. We have pending before the Committee on Rules right now a bill which I introduced requesting that the rules of the House be so amended as to give our committee jurisdiction over the operation of aircraft by steamship companies parallel to their own routes. At the present time, as the gentleman knows, all jurisdiction with respect to air travel rests with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That is all air travel whether it be trans-oceanic or domestic. We would like to bring them in, but I am sure the gentleman knows that the attitude of the Civil Aeronautics Board always has been and probably always will be that steamship lines, just the same as railroad lines, have no business getting into the air travel business at all.

Mr. WELCH. I will say to my friend that I was under the impression that authority had been granted to your committee by special resolution to summons witnesses and place them under oath.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. It has not yet.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. We had that matter up before the Committee on Rules a week ago, but in view of the fact that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was not represented at that time no action was taken. We intend to discuss the bill further just as soon as we can. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield to the former chairman of the committee.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman will recall that when the Civil Aeronautics Board was originally authorized by Congress they were very agreeable and made the statement that the merchant marine would take care of these matters.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. There must have been a little double talk at the time, because they have certainly shown no inclination to give any of the steamship operators an opportunity to get into the air field.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. Can the gentleman tell us what the safety record has been during the war period when, as I understand, these safety regulations have been waived?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Captain BRADLEY, as chairman of the subcommittee that handled these two bills, perhaps has more information than I, but as far as I know we have not had any loss of life attributable to these waivers of safety regulations. Commodore Shepheard, who is in charge of the old Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, now known as the Bureau of Marine Safety, when he testified before the committee told us it was because we have been mighty lucky. I know I can say that he casts no reflection whatsoever on the excellent seamanship of our officer personnel or our unlicensed personnel in the American merchant marine.

They have done an excellent heads-up job, but nevertheless when you are operating a ship carrying two or three thousand people with a lifeboat capacity for only 900 people across the North Atlantic in the middle of the winter, you cannot tell me we are not taking a chance.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VORYS. My question is outside the scope of this particular legislation, but I will be happy to have the gentleman's views on it.

Former President Hoover has recommended to the President that shipping costs for relief supplies to Germany could be substantially reduced if we would permit Liberty ships which are now idle, as I understand, to be manned by German crews and used for that purpose.

Has the gentleman's committee taken any action along that line or does the gentleman's committee contemplate any such action?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. We have taken no action along that line to date. It has not been a matter of discussion before the committee. We have had no request from the White House or Mr. Hoover or anybody else to consider it. I think in due course we will want to consider it because it is a broad question of policy as to whether or not we want to carry this relief load at a higher cost under the American scale of wages and safety standards or whether we want to permit the Germans to haul it themselves for whatever wages they pay their own people. Of course, the basic operating costs will be the same so far as coal and oil are concerned.

Mr. VORYS. The charges for the crew could be paid in German marks and that would relieve to a certain extent the burden on the American taxpayers for getting the relief supplies over to the other side.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. It is the old story that we had before the war. We could just simply put the food products on the docks here and then furnish the boats to haul it over and let them pay all the labor and operating costs of moving it.

Of course, as I understand it, Mr. Hoover's proposal is that we loan them these Liberty ships at a very nominal charge and unquestionably when we got them back—if we did get them back—they would be pretty well worn out because it is doubtful that they would receive any real maintenance. But if that is the way the foreign policy of the United States is to operate, so be it. I believe, however, that both your Committee on Foreign Affairs and my Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries are going to have to give this matter very careful study.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Could not the same condition apply to Japan?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. It could very easily.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, recently the San Francisco Examiner commemorated its sixtieth anniversary under its present owner, William Randolph Hearst. Throughout its 60 years the San Francisco Examiner has served the best interests of the development of San Francisco as a great international seaport city until today it is one of the world's greatest seaports.

The Examiner continues to follow that same policy by supporting the American merchant marine. Recently another editorial appeared in that newspaper dealing with the urgent need of American-flag shipping companies to have the right to operate overseas air lines parallel to their surface shipping lines.

The importance of the American merchant marine to the peacetime economy of this Nation has been demonstrated from the days of the American clipper ships down to the present. I believe every Member of this House is acquainted more or less with its history in the development of the foreign economy of our Nation.

More important than that, however, is the importance of the American merchant marine to our national defense, as was demonstrated in both World War I and World War II. It became one of the four major links in the chain of our national defense, along with the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps. It was the life line for supplies to our military and naval forces in every foreign theater of war.

I have repeatedly called attention of the House in years past to the crippling policy which has been followed by the Civil Aeronautics Board in denying the right, in accordance with the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, for the American merchant marine to operate air lines parallel to and as a component part of our surface shipping. Every foreign maritime nation has recognized the tremendous value accruing by coordinating their air lines and surface shipping by encouraging their ship operators to operate air lines as a basic part of their merchant marine in foreign surface. The Civil Aeronautics Board has aided these foreign countries by making arrangements for landing places for them in this country.

Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that because of the prohibition placed by the Civil Aeronautics Board on American shipping companies from operating American air lines as a unit of their business, at least one American shipping company has gone into a foreign country to purchase control in a foreign flag aviation company in order that it can meet the competition of foreign ship operators.

In its strong editorial entitled "United States Shipping Lines Need Air Rights" the San Francisco Examiner called attention to the utterly preposterous situation being forced upon our American shipping companies by the actions of the Civil Aeronautics Board. That editorial is as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING LINES NEED AIR RIGHTS

American shipping lines, custodians of the maritime enterprises of the United States which are inseparable from prosperous world commerce in peace and indispensable to successful national defense in war, are still waiting for a favorable decision by the American Government on their petition for equal air-sea rights with foreign competitors.

There is encouragement for the American maritime operators in the fact that the new Congress has shown an alert and sympathetic interest in this vital problem, and the several bills already introduced to equalize the world competitive conditions under which American ocean transport must operate seem assured of an early hearing.

But in the meantime it is still the policy of the American Government, as it has so long been, to deny American shipping lines the right to operate scheduled air service supplementary to and in coordination with established surface transport.

At the same time, it is still the parallel and incongruous policy of the American Government to freely grant this right to foreign commercial competitors, which are almost entirely organized on the basis of air-sea coordination either as private enterprise or Government monopoly.

This is an incomprehensible situation, flagrantly discriminatory against American shipping interests and potentially destructive of the American merchant marine on which so much depends in both peace and war, and yet the Civil Aeronautics Board persists in maintaining it.

Since the Civil Aeronautics Board continues to be adamant in this untenable position, there is no other recourse for the American shipping lines than that of appeal to Congress, with the whole future of prosperous American participation in world commerce hanging upon the outcome of their appeal.

It is utterly preposterous that an American steamship company, long established in the vital fields of ocean transport, should not be permitted to augment its services with supplementary air transport, when its foreign competitors are unreservedly and unhesitatingly allowed to do so.

This would be an understandable situation if the foreign governments having their own vital interests in the competing and coordinated foreign air-sea services were the authors of this crippling policy of discrimination and prohibition against the American companies. But it is our own American Government which thus strangely and adamantly imposes an impossible competitive condition upon the maritime interests of the United States.

If the American Government persists in this stupid policy, it will not only foreclose the American merchant marine against an effective and beneficial role in world commerce, but it will ultimately destroy the maritime mercantile establishments of the country and thus impair and impoverish our most essential instrument of national defense.

The new Congress should brook no delay in achieving a total reversal of American air-sea transportation policy, not only in the interest of assuring competitive equity to American maritime enterprise, but in the larger and more urgent interest of safeguarding American peace and security.

The time has come, Mr. Speaker, in this period of transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy when the Congress must take cognizance of the deliberate failure of the Civil Aeronautics Board to recognize the importance of the American merchant marine by enacting legislation that will directly impose upon the Civil Aeronautics Board the obligation to enable our American merchant marine to meet this foreign competition if it is to survive, or Congress must remove all jurisdiction from the Civil Aeronautics Board over the operation of overseas airlines by American shipping companies and vest it in the Maritime Commission.

(Mr. WELCH asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include an editorial from the San Francisco Examiner.)

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

SUSPENSION OF NAVIGATION LAWS BY SECRETARY OF WAR

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEICHEL].

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, our chairman and Captain BRADLEY have told you what the bill purports to do. It deals with human life, principally the lives of those in the armed forces. The time allowed for general debate does not seem quite enough to discuss this proposition.

The War Department is asking the Congress to give it discretion to waive or suspend the operation of every law enacted by the Congress for the safety of those at sea. That means it would have the right to suspend everything in this book which contains the laws providing for safety at sea.

A civilian before going on a ship, if he knows that the ship does not comply with the regulations with reference to safety at sea, has a choice to ride or not to ride. Our soldiers in the armed forces who are in the service by reason of the selective service law, young men whom we are asking to enlist by the hundreds of thousands, will be herded on board these ships regardless of the laws of safety at sea that this Congress has enacted over a period of years. These boys will not have a choice of riding or not riding on unsafe ships. I think this is worthy of much discussion and much debate on both sides when you ask for authority to herd our own soldiers onto ships that do not have safety devices which are provided by the laws of the United States, resulting from experience over a number of decades.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEICHEL] has expired.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1240) to provide for the suspension of navigation and vessel inspection laws, as applied to vessels operated by the War Department, upon the termination of title V, Second War Powers Act, 1942, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1240, with Mr. HERTER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat what I said a few minutes ago, that I ask for the consideration of this bill and for its passage with a certain amount of fear and trepidation.

The bill carries my name. It comes from the committee, of which I happen to be chairman, with almost a unanimous report. There was only one dissenting voice. If we should be so unfortunate at any time in the future as to have a serious accident—and it could happen—the Army will be pretty well protected. You do not need fear about that. You will never be able to put your finger on anybody in the Army and say they were responsible for the accident. You will not be able to put the blame on any of the bureaucrats. The finger will be on me—the Bradley bill from the Bradley committee, passed by the House of Representatives.

We have a great reputation in the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I want to maintain that reputation; but as I said previously, we have to move troops across the water. The Congress has authorized the moving of their families to join them, and bringing them back to this country. We certainly do not have adequate passenger merchant marine to take care of those people in a wholly safe manner. So the issue today is not whether it is a question of safety so much as do you want to leave those people over there indefinitely, carry food to them, let them live under unsanitary and unsatisfactory conditions as they are forced to do today? Do you want to leave a bunch of Nazis down here in South America which the State Department asked the Army to move out of those Latin-American countries back to Germany? There are about 5,800 of them. Do you want to take some of the displaced persons from Europe and transplant them to South America or elsewhere in order to take them off our hands over there in the occupied zones? Do you want to bring back the wives and children of our soldiers who are overseas? If you do, you have to bring them in the only bottoms that are available. That is the reason we have to pinch hit with these ships, many of which are cargo ships converted, with living quarters in the cargo hold that do not meet our safety standards with respect to fire hazards and so on, if we are going to move these people. That is all there is to it. That is why the War Department asked for these waivers on such ships as they are borrowing, if you please, from the merchant marine, which would otherwise be private ships. The safety-at-sea rules, of course, do not apply to War Department transports operated by the War Department.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Is it not true that if we are to carry these people in our own ships we have no alternative other than to pass this legislation?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. That is absolutely true.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. And, as a matter of fact, is it not also true that even though we are going to have new passenger ships of standards in compliance with the safety-at-sea laws, it will be quite some time before they are available?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. The reason we do not have passenger ships today, I may say to the gentleman from Washington, and as he knows, is because they are in drydock and repair yards being refitted for peacetime purposes following their wartime uses.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Yes; and in addition we have appropriated money for new passenger vessels which ships will not be available for some time.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. That is true.

I also wish to point out to the gentleman from Washington that when we talk about hauling these people in safe ships the argument is advanced that we might bring them over in foreign ships. Mr. Chairman, there is not a single foreign ship, there is not a ship outside of the American merchant marine, that can meet the safety requirements of this country. You talk about the Queen Elizabeth, and similar ships, there is not one of them that could sail under the American flag without a waiver from the Coast Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to impose upon the time of the Committee. The gentleman from California, the chairman of the subcommittee, in his address to the House during consideration of the rule, made a very clear, accurate, and, I think, complete statement of the purposes of this bill; and my distinguished friend the gentleman from Washington, in his query just now, emphasized what the chairman of the committee brought out very clearly—the fact that if we are to continue the very important and very necessary work upon which the War Department is now engaged, then we must pass this bill and pass it in short order. Unless this bill becomes law by the 31st of March, title 5 of the Second War Powers Act will have expired; and unless this bill is passed, there will be no legislative authority to warrant or authorize American vessels to continue under the jurisdiction of the War Department transporting our troops, their wives and children, and do all of the other necessary things they now have to perform—services important to the destiny of the world.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Washington pointed out in his question, it is this bill or a complete cessation of the work of the War Department; the House has no other choice. It must adopt this bill, or it must handicap and, indeed, completely thwart and cripple the War Department in its work of carrying our troops all over the face of the world. I know the Congress has no disposition to take such action as will result in that situation.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of any time I myself have not used, and, with the permission of the gentleman in charge of the debate, I should like to yield such time as he may require to the distinguished former chairman of the committee and its present ranking minority member, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I can safely say that no man in this House today has more particular interest in safety legislation than I. I passed through the throes of the Vestris disaster, the Mohawk disaster, and the Morro Castle disaster, of which safety legislation was the logical result, and from the time of those disasters up to now I have been trying to secure the best safety legislation that could apply to the merchant marine.

Frankly, I am with the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California [Mr. BRADLEY], in his support of this bill. I think he has stated the position well. I have no hesitancy, however, in saying that if there is any criticism at any time of his support of this bill or to the introduction of this bill, that criticism belongs to the two sides of the House. There has been no politics in this. Therefore, I fear no criticism. The gentleman from Washington, the gentleman from New Jersey, and the gentleman from Michigan have made it clear that this is necessary legislation in order that we may move our troops. We cannot recondition the old ships sufficiently fast to carry it out. The limitation that now applies under the War Powers Act expires on the 31st day of March, and you just simply cannot make your ships any better in that time. When you come to foreign ships we have the best and safest ships in the world, and there would be danger in foreign ships, certainly as much danger as could possibly exist with the legislation that we seek to put upon the books. This is necessary in order to accomplish the purposes which we have undertaken and to carry out not only the work of our merchant marine but the more important work which the War Department has undertaken and the important work that confronts us in the reconditioning of affairs in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the bill may be enacted into law as speedily as possible.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEICHEL].

SAFETY AT SEA FOR SOLDIERS

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Chairman, the pending legislation covered by H. R. 1240 is one dealing with the lives of American citizens and particularly those in the armed forces who are performing military duties throughout the world, not only for the protection of America but that of other nations. The war has been over 2 years and now the War Department asks for a suspension of the laws with reference to safety at sea in the transportation of our 18- and 19-year-old boys to the four corners of the earth. With the billions that have been spent, it seems little thought has been expended to transport our armed forces on ships that meet the safety laws passed by the Congress of the United States. The War Department well knew that it would be transporting soldiers overseas and in these 2 years no safe ships are provided. And now with an excuse that the War Powers Act might not be extended, the War Department asks that it be given the authority to suspend every law with reference to safety at sea in its use of the ships to transport those in the armed forces. The shipyards of this country did not close on the day of the ending of the war, but the War Department has not used the shipyards to provide safe ships for the transportation of those in the armed forces. Since the ending of the war the shipyards of this country surely could have provided in 2 years safe ships for the transportation of our armed forces. It seems to me that the providing of safe ships for our soldiers in time of peace should have been the very first order of business during the past 2 years since the ending of the war. Hundreds of ships are laid up and out of commission, yet in the name of this neglect and inefficiency of the War Department, in not taking every shipyard facility in the United States to make safe ships, the Congress is asked to set aside and suspend the law for safety at sea, especially in the transportation of our young soldiers overseas. I believe the Congress should give every safety protection to the soldiers of our country, and should not make it possible for bureaus and departments to jeopardize their safety because of past failures.

When it comes time for amendments I would like to offer for your consideration an amendment that might save many lives.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTS].

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Chairman, the United States has the greatest safety standards of any nation in the world today on maritime affairs. It is not without regret that we are forced at this time to pass this legislation. We have no choice in the matter. Even the great Queen Elizabeth and the Queen Mary today, in peacetime, would not be allowed to sail under the American flag, except on waivers because those two great ships do not comply with American safety standards. So, you see, we have set our sights very, very high, and laudably so. But we must not hamstring the Army, because there are no ships afloat today that can meet our requirements. The Army must be permitted to carry on its great duties and tasks.

We had one ship, I believe, that met all necessary requirements, and that was the America, and I read only about a week ago that on her last trip she had to sail under waivers. Our War Department and our Army and Navy are not going to permit our boys and girls to sail in tubs. The ships may not meet all safety requirements, but all those requirements which are practicable under the circumstances, I am sure, will be met. This legislation permits the War Department to waive present requirements until December 31, 1947.

Under the circumstances we have only what is called Hobson's choice.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I cannot bring myself to vote for a bill that would force some of the soldiers who are overseas, to the number of half a million or more, to ride home in Government vessels which are without even ordinary safety requirements, with danger to their lives, and, when accompanied by their wives and children, with danger to the wives and children, all because Congress and the War Department have not met this situation in time. It is true that the war has been over 2 years. There has been ample opportunity for everybody in authority to know that this war act expires on the 31st day of March. Because of the fact that we have done nothing about the matter now we are about to urge, or to command, or to demand, that these soldier boys of ours overseas ride home in unsafe vessels.

If the safety regulations adopted by Congress were not wise at the time they were enacted, then they are not wise today, but if they were wise when enacted and were intended to save human life, then there is no reason why Congress now should reverse its action and sanction risking the lives of our soldiers, those now overseas and those who will continue to be sent abroad by even authorizing the War Department, the Coast Guard, or any other Government agency to waive even ordinary safety requirements in the ships on which they sail. Even permitting civilian people to run such risks voluntarily should be made a crime. Packing and overloading ships carrying soldiers may become a crime of vast significance. I shall not vote for such a measure. I do not want to be a party to sending word to the parents, wives, other relatives of the soldiers that our great Government will approve such dangerous methods and measures.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BRADLEY], chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Mr. Chairman, at the present time, as an aftermath of the war, the Army is operating a number of C–4's—about 13 just now—designed as cargo vessels, but used as troop-carriers during the war. These ships transported hundreds of thousands of American military personnel during and after the war with an admirable safety record. Under normal conditions they should all be retired from service, but there are large troop movements which must be made, and there are great numbers of other personnel attached to various Army activities, such as dependents, military government officials and families, and so forth, which must be moved, and, since the capacity of public vessels and of vessels now operated by private interests is totally inadequate to care for this necessary transportation, it is imperative that these C–4's be continued in operation until other ships may become available. In fact, there is no other solution to the problem, unless we are to discontinue many of our activities entirely as there are neither other American ships nor foreign-flag ships available to take the places of these C–4's.

These particular ships do not comply with our laws and cannot be made to do so without very extensive conversions involving long delays and huge costs. Their design, as cargo ships, makes conversion to accepted passenger standards practically out of the question. I cite here a few of the known deficiencies: The lifeboats and lifesaving equipment in general were designed for the purpose of handling troops while the ships were carrying out their wartime duties, chiefly as attack transports. In the peformance of such duties quick lowering of boats at sea was of secondary importance, as the purpose of the ships was to transport numbers of men into harbors, in relatively smooth water, where the boats could be handled by power apparatus and put in the water as required to disembark troops in landing operations. Naturally, lifeboats which normally require power for launching are not deemed at all satisfactory for saving of life at sea where it may be necessary to launch boats without power, due to failure of the vessel's power plant on account of flooding or other damage. It is not likely that this will occur, and it is to be assumed, therefore, that the boats could be launched at sea in the event of disaster. However, in all of our rules for the saving of life at sea we choose to rule out everything which might be questionable, and so we would not ordinarily choose this type of launching apparatus for the boats of passenger vessels. These ships carry ample life-raft equipment. In some cases they are rigged for quick launching and in others they are rather unavailable in emergencies. All such vessels carry adequate life preservers, but life preservers, in themselves, must not be considered as adequate replacements for boat capacity in the North Atlantic in wintertime.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I think the gentleman would agree with me that neither a life preserver nor a life raft would be much protection on the North Atlantic at this time of year.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. They would be no protection whatsoever, may I say to the gentleman from Michigan.

These vessels do not comply with the requirements insofar as fire protection is concerned. They are of steel construction and have very little combustible material on board. They do not, however, have the sprinkler systems, the fire-detecting system, or the fire-resisting bulkheads required by our laws.

In a ship with large amounts of wood used in her interior construction, I should consider these faults grave, indeed, but in these C–4's they are greatly minimized by the fact that there is so little wood anywhere on board.

There are some doors through vertical transverse bulkheads below the water line. These are very substantial and, I am informed, are closed and secured prior to the ship's departure from port. If the doors are kept closed, they are not any detriment to safety. These doors are not fitted with remote control from the bridge, but many of them are fitted with mechanical control from a nearby station.

The living quarters on these ships are extremely poor. They are, in fact, merely troop quarters converted for other purposes.

There are other minor deficiencies such as lask of required communication systems, but none of these are such as to greatly imperil the ship.

I do not consider these ships as dangerous; in fact, they are as safe as most ships now operating under foreign flags, but neither do I consider them as safe or suitable for operation under the American flag in the service of the Army under ordinary conditions.

I spent the last two week-ends inspecting various vessels under the American flag—including some of those operated under the jurisdiction of the Army. In one case I found that a C–4, Army operated, made a westbound trans-Atlantic passage in December 1946 with a total of 2,063 passengers, which meant that the ship had a total of over 2,300 people on board. As her lifeboat capacity is only 1,048 and as her other buoyant equipment would have been rather useless in the North Atlantic in winter weather, I consider this to have been an unjustifiable risk of life and I call upon the War Department to reduce materially the number of passengers carried on board such a vessel at any one time even though transportation is delayed and personnel inconvenienced. May I repeat, that the war is over, and that the American public will not look with equanimity upon a preventable maritime disaster even though the War Department may be clear of legal responsibility under waiver of vessel-inspection laws by act of Congress. Being sorry will not bring back human life. The time for the War Department to act is now.

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEICHEL. The bill presently under consideration gives the War Department absolute authority to do the very thing we asked them not to do. There is no limitation in this bill whatsoever, is there?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I appreciate that, but I may say I feel no doubt whatever but that the War Department will comply with our wishes in the question. I feel we must allow some discretion to the responsible officers of the War Department. I have been assured already that they will comply with our wishes in every way.

Mr. WEICHEL. After they have been given full authority you think they will better comply than when they do not have authority to waive the rules and regulations?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. May I say to the gentleman from Ohio I am sure they will comply with them. I intend to continue looking at their ships and spreading the information on the record if they do not comply. I feel no doubt but what they will comply.

Certain testimony before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries indicates that efforts will be made to obtain the use of some of these C–4's under the jurisdiction of the Army for the transportation of displaced persons from Europe to South America and for other purposes alien to usual War Department uses. While it is no part of my prerogative to determine upon the necessity of moving these displaced persons, I do feel that the War Department should not utilize these vessels upon which waivers have been requested—ostensibly for the proper accomplishment of legitimate duties of that Department—for the transportation of great numbers of people of all ages and sexes on long voyages to different parts of the world. If the need for such transportation is imperative, and the War Department feels that it is the proper agency to provide it, I believe that the Secretary of War should make request to the Congress for specific authority in the premises rather than going into the world passenger-carrying business with ships which do not comply with our minimum safety standards of which the use is permitted, only because of the emergency conditions existing in our own maritime establishment.

The War Department has stated that it expects the need for these vessels on which waivers are being requested to be ended by January 1, 1948.

Mr. Chairman, under the conditions existing, I believe that this bill, as amended, should receive the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], and I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have an opportunity this afternoon, while the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries is reporting out a bill from that very excellent committee, with whose work I have been quite familiar over a period of years, to call to their attention a matter of special interest, particularly to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], former chairman of that committee, and his colleagues, many of whom are serving today as they have for several years past. I call attention to the desperate plight in which the fisheries industry of this country finds itself.

Only within the past few minutes I have been handed an article that appeared in the Wall Street Journal relative to the tremendous imports of fish from foreign countries. When we speak of fish coming to this country we speak of another manufactured product. We speak in the same sense that we spoke yesterday when we spoke of copper coming from foreign countries in competition with the copper mined in this country.

Today we are facing a condition in this country as the result of development of industries abroad, where low wages and poor working conditions exist, that unless some protection is set up in the form of a tariff wall or a quota, our industries in this country will be deluged with competition from foreign sources.

The article in the Wall Street Journal which I wish to call to the attention of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and also to the attention of the Ways and Means Committee which considers tariff legislation, states:

> Visions of being swamped in a tidal wave of foreign fish have United States commercial fishermen blue around the gills.
>
> Already the wave is wildly splashing over the tariff wall. And State Department talk of knocking a few stones from the top of that wall puts the fishermen through a St. Vitus dance.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Does the gentleman recall that during the war, under the terms of lend-lease, we took some Russian ships belonging to our friends over there and reconditioned them and made floating cannons out of them in our own shipyards, under lend-lease?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is true. Of course, some of those ships, under lend-lease, have been converted to great refrigerator ships, probably to which the gentleman refers. But I wish to call to the attention of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries that the imports of fish today constitute over 40 percent of the entire production of what we call fish filets in the New England area. That is fish from which the bone is taken and made available to the markets in this country. It is over 40 percent of what we produce in the New England area.

This article refers to the situation that exists in Seattle. Out of a fleet of 350 "otter" trawlers, the type used in catching fish for filets, only a lonely 25 are now in operation. The rest are idle. They cannot operate at high cost against the competition of outside fish prices that they enumerate in this article. We see the spirit of the totalitarian states spreading over Europe, and we see the nationalization of industries taking place in those countries. The industries themselves are subsidized and the industries pay atrociously low wages to their employees, who must work under the most deplorable conditions. We simply cannot compete against such conditions and maintain our industrial working class in the United States.

I am making these few statements to this Committee and to the Ways and Means Committee only to indicate that a full study must be made of the over-all and most pressing problem confronting our industries, particularly the fishing, shoe, and textile industries. As soon as Europe and Asia rehabilitate their industry and commerce we shall feel the brunt of their competition. While we, of course, are happy to help them, there is a limit beyond which we cannot go.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MEADE].

Mr. MEADE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I represent one of the largest shipbuilding districts in the United States. I rise in support of the bill, but I support it with the greatest reluctance. I support it simply because it seems to me to be the only thing to do under the circumstances.

It is, indeed, a sad commentary on our short-sightedness and lack of planning for our future self-protection to have safety laws but no ships capable of complying with them. I, therefore, call upon this Congress to give the most careful consideration to seeing that proper appropriations are made so that we can have sufficient passenger cargo ships of modern design and meeting proper safety standards, so that American ships can take their proper place on the seven seas of the world and so the American merchant marine will be second to none.

The Congress of the United States, through the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, established a United States Maritime Commission and directed that organization "to further the development and maintenance of an adequate and well-balanced American merchant marine, promote the commerce of the United States, and to aid in the national defense." Today we find the Maritime Commission and the merchant marine in the very peculiar position of having carried out its directives too well.

The Maritime Commission which we established had hardly wet its feet in a sound program for our merchant marine industry when war broke out in Europe and when this Nation was drawn into the turmoil through the bombing of Pearl Harbor. We, as a nation, and many of the young men in our armed forces who returned home safely, can thank our lucky stars that the program of the Martime Commission was established and working when we went to war. In World War I the shipyards of this country, tremendous though they were, failed to deliver a single newly constructed dry-cargo vessel before the armistice was signed. Our men and equipment were transported on foreign-flag ships.

During the first year of the recent hostilities the merchant shipyards of the Nation, under the direction of the United States Maritime Commission, delivered more than 8,000,000 deadweight tons of cargo shipping into the service of the Allies. The shipbuilding know-how, developed under the 1936 act and vital to the Nation, was paying big dividends. The next year 16,000,000 tons were delivered, and by the middle of the third year the shipping needs of our United Nations had been largely met and our supplies flowed overseas on a bridge of ships. That bridge of ships saved thousands of lives and made a vital contribution to an early end of hostilities. These same ships continued to serve the world in its rehabilitation and relief.

Today that Commission, with its war task successfully accomplished, stands in the unique position of having the world's largest merchant fleet, yet vitally lacking in the elements of a well-balanced fleet, as directed by the Merchant Marine Act.

War did not require the building of passenger-type vessels, except as troop ships, nor did it require the building of the latest modern technically improved cargo ships. War demanded only that we get the ships quickly and move great weights of cargoes overseas. Cargo ships became as much an implement of war as tanks, bombers, and battleships.

In the early days of the war our entire passenger fleet was extensively converted in that other phase of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936—the national defense. The one-hundred-and-thirty-odd passenger vessels in the active American flag service in June of 1939 became the troop ships and special-service ships of the armed services that carried our men safely overseas.

Of that prewar merchant fleet more than one-third were over 20 years of age, the legal lifetime set by the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. It was part of the Maritime Commission's program to replace these passenger ships as they reached the end of their longevity. War prevented the orderly procedure outlined by the Maritime Commission. That passenger-ship operation is vital to the merchant-marine industry, can best be pointed out by a situation which existed prior to the war. In 1 day foreign-flag ships, in competition with American-flag ships, carried out of New York Harbor 5,000 passengers, most of them American, skimming the cream from some $1,500,000 worth of business. The United States needs passenger ships to carry our businessmen and the products of America to the whole world.

Today the United States merchant marine faces world competition again. Practically every maritime nation in the world is rushing the completion of the most modern merchant fleet, including adequate passenger transportation facilities, yet the shipyards of America have not laid a single keel to replace the vessels lost in war service or those which have became over-age, or those whose extensive military conversion makes it too expensive to reconvert them.

Great Britain alone is building 454 vessels; Holland, 91; Italy, 87; Sweden, 66; Norway, 62; and France, 58. Among these vessels are passenger vessels designed to once again skim the cream of American travelers. Compared to these fleets, American shipyards have under construction some 64 vessels, of which the major portion are cargo types carrying relatively few passengers and designed for specific trades.

The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the House of Representatives has recently held hearings and approved the extension of waiver privileges to the Coast Guard in order that the vital need for passenger ships might be met through the use of troopships and other vessels which do not meet American standards.

We do not want, and we must not, continue to use these ships beyond the existing emergency. We should replace them with adequate passenger tonnage designed to keep the American flag in the world's passenger business. The Merchant Marine Act directs the Maritime Commission to build a fleet composed of the best equipped, safest, and most suitable types of vessels, yet today, in the North Atlantic, there is only one passenger ship carrying the Stars and Stripes which meets all the Coast Guard requirements and American standards. That is the flagship of our merchant fleet—the America—the largest vessel ever built in this country and admittedly the safest ship afloat. We need more ships with those same characteristics. Some of our prewar passenger vessels are still operating in emergency service under waivers from the Coast Guard. A few are in various stages of reconversion to resume their passenger runs. At the moment that is all that is being done to meet this critical situation, and it falls far short of meeting the directives of the Congress.

A year ago the United States Maritime Commission approved 31 ocean-trade routes essential to the economy and defense of this Nation. How essential these routes were was felt by the people of this Nation when our coffee cups and sugar bowls ran dry. Foreign shipping, upon which we had come to depend, was withdrawn from our shores by the war in Europe. The mother countries had called home their fleets for their defense.

In view of these essential trade routes, the Maritime Commission has set up minimum requirements for each route, establishing the number of vessels and the type of service believed to be essential to meet the directives of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

The Maritime Commission had laid plans for the design of vessels it anticipated would be required to meet such services. The Commission had received bids on three vessels to be placed in the North Atlantic-Mediterranean run, but deferred construction of these vessels at the request of the administration until such time as materials might be more available. Other ships were on the drawing boards which would place the United States merchant fleet in a truly competitive position with foreign-flag vessels and meet the directives of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. However, unless the Congress provides the funds necessary to carry out the directives of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 the hands of the United States Maritime Commission are tied and each day our merchant fleet loses its equitable share of world trade and foreign commerce.

It is my belief that all agencies of Government should cooperate in supporting this Nation's position in all phases of our endeavor to create a world united in lasting peace. As the Maritime Commission bent its efforts to aid the armed services in winning the war and, following the end of the war, carried out the requests of the United Nations and the United States Government in the rehabilitation of the world, so should our peacetime government in all its elements support our peacetime merchant marine. I therefore urge that this Congress give full consideration to the carrying out of the directives so clearly stated in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, "It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to foster the development and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine," adequate to carry a substantial share of our world trade and to serve in our Nation's defense, a truly well-balanced merchant marine.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I have no further request for time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further requests for time, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the termination of title V of the Second War Powers Act, 1942, as last amended by the act of June 29, 1946 (Public, No. 475, 79th Cong.), and upon request of the Secretary of War to the head of each department or agency responsible for the administration of navigation and vessel-inspection laws, the operation of all such laws shall be suspended in relation to all vessels operated by the War Department: Provided, That such suspension shall be effective only until December 31, 1947.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, at the end of line 8, insert "of which suspension is so requested."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 1, after the word "department", insert "as to which such suspension has been requested."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEICHEL: Page 2, line 4, after the date "1947", insert a paragraph as follows:

"Provided further, That the operation of the navigation and vessel-inspection laws requiring specified lifesaving equipment shall not be so suspended."

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Chairman, it can be readily seen that there should be offered to the soldier in the armed forces some little protection. Even though there might be a so-called necessity to waive every law protecting those at sea during the war, I hardly see that need in peacetime. But if you want to give this authority to the War Department to waive every law with reference to safety at sea and permit the herding of our soldiers on ships, I ask you at least to consider this amendment whereby the War Department cannot suspend the specific laws with reference to lifesaving equipment on a ship.

That is all I have to say with reference to the amendment I have offered. I ask that you give the soldier at least this little bit of protection.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the pending amendment would practically make the entire bill useless. The fundamental difficulties of the ships which are covered are deficiencies in lifesaving arrangements. Those deficiencies are primarily due to war conditions. As I explained to you, most of these ships for which we are requesting waiver are those which were built for the purpose of landing troops in various harbors where invasions were contemplated and where you had ample time to pick your boats up with power, put your troops in, and launch them. The double-bank boats were entirely satisfactory also. However, that type of davit is not acceptable to the Coast Guard and is not acceptable under the safety laws of the United States. Our safety laws require davits for ships carrying passengers to be such that the lifeboats may be launched without power. That is, you may drop certain chocks, push your boats and davit out, and lower away. You cannot do that in many ships fitted for combat service.

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. POTTS. Does the gentleman understand that the ships which are operated have adequate lifesaving boats and equipment of that type?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Some of them have that type of davit and some are a slightly different type, which is more acceptable.

Mr. POTTS. They all have sufficient lifeboats to take care of the people who are carried in the ships?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. They all have sufficient boats to take care of the people whom I contemplate the War Department will be carrying in the ships. As I said in my previous talk, they are carrying sometimes twice as many people now as they have boat capacity for, but we contemplate that will stop and the War Department has assured me it will stop.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Are the men to be allowed their choice in taking these boats?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. There is no choice, as far as I know. There are no other ships. If the Army must go it must go in the type of ships that are available. If the public or dependents wish to go on that type of ship they have the privilege of going. If they do not want to travel on that type of ship they must stay at home because there are no other ships.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Do they know what kind of ships they are sailing in?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I would assume the Army people know what they are getting into. I may also assure the gentlewoman from Massachusetts that the Army has an almost perfect record during the war and since the war in the operation of these ships. Personally, I do not like it, but there is no other choice that I can see.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They can find no other ships?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. There are no ships available in the world today except these. It is the general impression that we stand in a very fine position insofar as the merchant marine is concerned, but we have never been in such a sad condition in the history of the United States so far as I know concerning passenger ships.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. No effort has been made to find out the feelings of the people who want to go on those ships?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEICHEL].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HERTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1240) to provide for the suspension of navigation and vessel inspection laws, as applied to vessels operated by the War Department, upon the termination of title V, Second War Powers Act, 1942, as amended, pursuant to House Resolution 131, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROBERTSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. HESELTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement he made last Monday before the House Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PRICE of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and to include articles in each.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

WAIVING COMPLIANCE WITH CERTAIN NAVIGATION AND VESSEL-INSPECTION LAWS

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 130 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 76) authorizing and directing the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to waive compliance navigation and vessel-inspection laws administered by the Coast Guard. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment, the committee shall rise and report the same back to the House with such amendments as shall have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the consideration of House Joint Resolution 76, authorizing and directing the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to waive compliance navigation and vessel-inspection laws administered by the Coast Guard.

Mr. Speaker, this House joint resolution is almost identical to the bill which the House has just passed, H. R. 1240. This measure covers all vessels operated by our merchant marine, while the previous legislation referred only to vessels belonging to and operated by the War Department. These ships are urgently needed, but cannot meet the high safety standards now required. For this reason, the authority to waive inspection laws must be continued after the expiration of the Second War Powers Act.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been reported, as I understand, by unanimous vote of your committee. A rule was also granted by unanimous vote. Because it is my aim to expedite the business of the House, and having no requests for time, the gentleman may move the previous question.

Mr. CHENOWETH. I thank the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House Committee on Banking and Currency may have until midnight Saturday night to file reports on House bill 2535 and House Joint Resolution 146.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

WAIVING COMPLIANCE WITH CERTAIN NAVIGATION AND VESSEL-INSPECTION LAWS

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 76) authorizing and directing the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to waive compliance navigation and vessel-inspection laws administered by the Coast Guard.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 76, with Mr. GAMBLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the joint resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I have previously explained, in the debate on the bill H. R. 1240, the fears I have with respect to that legislation as well as the pending legislation which, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH], of the Rules Committee, has said, are identical in their purposes. This bill applies, of course, to civilian vessels, the inspection laws covering which are administered by the commandant of the Coast Guard through the Bureau of Marine Safety.

There are two basic questions to be considered in the waiving of these laws in this particular case as applied to civilian vessels. The first one has to do with the waiving of the safety requirements; and the same arguments advanced as to the bill H. R. 1240 apply generally to this particular bill, except for the fact that in most instances, I think practically in all instances, we have had no evidence that these ships have been overloaded to the extent of the Army ships in the movement of their people.

The second phase has to do with the waiving of the safety requirements with respect to the crews; that is, the waiving of the employment of a certain percentage of aliens in a crew.

Now, to touch on the first question: Again we come up against the problem that we have a lot of people to be moved all over the world; and the only way we can move them is in the bottoms that are presently available, because there are not sufficient passenger ships available today.

As I previously said, most of them are in the shipyards being reconverted from their wartime service. There are only five passenger ships operating on the oceans of the world today that would come up to our safety requirements and can be operated without waiver. There is the liner America, which is the safest ship afloat. There are three ships being operated in the South American trade. There is also one ship operating on the Pacific. That is the whole list of the American passenger merchant marine as of today that can operate without these waivers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at this point, under authority granted me previously today in the House, I want to incorporate a tabulation of the passenger ships operating in the United States North Atlantic ports, European Atlantic, and Mediterranean ports, as furnished to our Committee by Commander Parkhurst of the Maritime Commission. Remember, if you will, what I previously said today, that our safety standards are the highest in the world and we have testimony before our committee that there is not a single flagship today that can measure up to our standards and Americans are traveling on them. So when people try to tell you, or scare headlines cry out, we are carrying people in an unsafe manner in the American merchant marine, just remember that these foreign flagships, in my opinion, are by and large not as safe as the ships for which these waivers are presently being asked. Also, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the Membership of this House look over the total carrying capacity of the present passenger-carrying merchant marine as contrasted with those of foreign flags and then ask yourselves whether the American merchant marine is today paramount on the high seas. It certainly is not and it is to our disgrace that it is not. It is about time we wake up, if we would maintain the American merchant marine paramount.

We have to have appropriations to build ships, if we are to compete in the world trade. We must have comparable operating costs, and that includes labor costs. Above all, we must have courteous crews. We must have a cuisine equal to that on foreign ships. In short we must realize that as of today we cannot maintain the American flag paramount on the high seas as far as passenger carrying is concerned, unless we wake up; and, as the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH] pointed out earlier today, we must permit the American merchant marine to operate aircraft in the world trade paralleling their own steamship routes, on many of which we pay a handsome subsidy from the American taxpayers' pockets.

We have about 40,000 American citizens overseas who were trapped there during the war and are anxious to get back to this country. They are anxious to move in anything that will float, with a reasonable degree of safety. These ships, while they are still operating under waiver, are reasonably safe. As the gentleman from California [Mr. BRADLEY] pointed out as to the last bill, the biggest hazard on these ships is the question of fire protection. They do have sufficient lifeboat capacity on these ships as they are now being operated. Many of them are converted cargo carriers, C–4's, as we call them. Some of them are known as what they call dormitory ships, which are just exactly what the term signifies. They have large dormitories for men, women, and children, and central lavatory facilities, sanitation facilities, and so forth.

We have about 75,000 displaced persons in Europe today being fed by the army of occupation forces. We have to feed them or move them. We are trying to repatriate some of these people just where they are, and some we are trying to move down to South America, so that they can settle there where there is territory for them in which to live. They have to be moved by somebody. Our State Department wants us to do it and we are trying our best to do it.

As I previously said, something like 5,800 dangerous Nazis, in the opinion of our State Department and Army officials, ought to be moved out of South America back to Germany. We have a certain number of people who have to go abroad either for their own private business or on the business of the Government. Those people have to be moved. We simply have to take advantage of the bottoms that exist.

With reference to this manning situation, there we have a situation we do not like. I do not know how many of you have had an opportunity to read the RECORD of yesterday. I placed in the Appendix of the RECORD yesterday, page A969, some correspondence that I had with Mr. Phil Murray calling attention to a telegram which he sent me on February 25 last, in which he complained that we were selling our ships, both privately owned and Government owned, out of the surplus fleet, for operation under the Panamanian and Honduran flags.

In a conference this morning with Mr. Joseph Curran, president of the CIO National Maritime Union, and Mr. Harry Lundeberg, president of the Seafarers' International Union, representing two of the largest maritime unions, they complained that we were selling ships to Greece and other countries for operation under foreign flags. The figures which I shall put in the RECORD do not bear out their statements to quite the degree that they had previously been informed, and they admitted that they had no definite figures.

I shall insert in the RECORD figures from the Maritime Commission:

Approvals granted, pursuant to secs. 9 and 37 of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, of the transfer to foreign ownership and/or registry and flag of American-owned vessels for the period commencing July 1, 1946, to and including Jan. 31, 1947

[1] Of this total 18 were under 1,000 gross tons, 15 of which were sold to UNRRA.

On the same date, February 25, I had a letter from Mr. Philip Murray, president of the CIO, in which he complained that we were not permitting a sufficient number of aliens to work on our ships. On the one hand, they complain about selling the ships for foreign-flag operation by American operators, which he says is being done to avoid the high standard of American wages and safety at sea, and then in the next letter they turn around and complain because we are not permitting sufficient aliens to work on our ships.

The figures show that we have about 17½ percent alien crews on our ships operating today. I shall put in the RECORD the exact figures under permission obtained in the House earlier today. I will also insert in the RECORD a breakdown of the number of these alien seamen who are now in the merchant marine. A little while ago they had a delegation down here who went around to the State Department and the Maritime Commission and the Coast Guard and some of the Members of Congress, although they did not come in to see me, with a proposal that we will have before our committee very shortly, in which they asked that we blanket into American citizenship some 14,000 alien seamen who served in the American merchant marine during the war. They propose that they shall be automatically blanketed in. They made the representation that the vast majority of these aliens were Norwegians, Danes, and other Scandinavians. As a matter of fact, a break-down of the figures shows an entirely different story. There are perhaps within this 14,000 not to exceed 1,000 Scandinavians. By far the greater majority of them are men from the Latin-American countries who are National Maritime Union members and are very glad indeed to work under our high scale of wages and are very glad indeed to pay the union dues, which seems to be the principal concern of the unions and seems to be the main reason why they are interested in having these men blanketed into citizenship. They are easier to control.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order that the record may be straight, and in order that the facts may be known to the public and to the unions and to everyone else, I insert in the RECORD at this point several statistical documents—the first of which is a tabulation presented by the Coast Guard giving the complete data of the number of aliens in the unlicensed crews of American registered vessels at sea on March 7, 1947.

TABLE I—Data on aliens in unlicensed areas of American-registered vessels at sea on Mar. 7, 1947

	Number of American-registered vessels at sea	Number of unlicensed personnel aboard such vessels	Number of unlicensed aliens aboard such vessels	Percentage of aliens in unlicensed personnel
Atlantic coast	893	32,602	6,695	20.5
Gulf coast	291	11,410	1,244	10.9
Pacific coast	277	8,887	1,324	14.9
Total	1,461	52,899	9,263	17.5

Now, that gives the over-all picture. Next, I submit table 2, likewise prepared from the actual shipping records of the ships at sea on March 7, 1947, furnished by the Coast Guard. At my request they endeavored to give us a spot check on ships then at sea on the Atlantic, the Gulf and the Pacific. In the time available, we could not cover each of these 1,461 ships, but we made a spot check on these three sea lanes taking the exact figures on one passenger ship, one combination passenger and cargo ship, three freighters and three tankers. While the figures speak for themselves as to nationalities, I call your attention to the fact that the spot check shows an over-all average of 17.4 percent of aliens in the unlicensed personnel—which jibes very closely with the 17.5 percent previously referred to:

TABLE II.—Data on aliens according to nationalities in unlicensed crews of 8 American registered vessels (1 passenger, 1 combination passenger and cargo, 3 freighters, and 3 tankers) from each of the three coasts (Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf) at sea on Mar. 7, 1947

Now, Mr. Chairman, right at this point, I want to call attention to some figures which were very interesting to me. They refer to the crew lists of the steamship America, the safest ship afloat and the flagship of our passenger-carrying merchant marine, and the steamship Washington. In submitting these figures I should give the membership a little of the background. These are, perhaps, our two best passenger-carrying ships with which we are attempting to capture the postwar travel of the citizens of this Nation and the entire world.

When we put the steamship America back into service, we went to considerable pains to hand-pick her crew. Mr. Curran of the National Maritime Union and Admiral Smith of the Maritime Commission cooperated in hand-picking this crew and in bringing them to the war-famous Sheepshead Bay Training Center, just outside of New York, where they were especially trained and indoctrinated into how to serve the world-wide traveling public so that that same international public could be made to realize we were really making a bid for supremacy on the high seas as far as passenger vessels were concerned. The steamship Washington is, perhaps, our second best bid for this world supremacy.

It is interesting to note the fact that while we spent many many thousands of dollars training these special crews, under the rotary hiring system followed by the unions today many of the original members of these crews have since gotten off those ships and as the figures show have been supplanted by an ever-increasing number of aliens. It is an ominous trend I do not like and, frankly, I don't believe the union leadership likes it either. I know the operators of the steamships themselves do not like it.

Mr. Chairman, as I told Mr. Murray, as chairman of this Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, I stand four-square for an American merchant marine second to none in this world, manned by American citizens, and I believe my splendid committee stands back of me foursquare; and if there is anyone who doubts that or questions the stand our committee has taken, we will be very glad to give them a thoroughly aired hearing at any time.

I have expressed my thorough disapproval of this entire program in no uncertain terms, which you will find in the RECORD and which I shall not repeat.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this matter of aliens was called to my attention after the subcommittee had reported the bill. I did not know what trick the union had up its sleeve. But when the bill is read for amendment I intend to offer an amendment which will instruct the Commandant of the Coast Guard that he shall not issue waiver on any aliens except for employment in the steward's department. I have talked it over with Commodore Shepheard of the Coast Guard and Admiral Smith of the Maritime Commission and the operators and they are all in accord. Personally, I would like to insist that no waivers be granted on account of aliens anywhere on our ships, but they tell me there is a distinct shortage of qualified seamen in the steward's department and they feel for the time being they will have to ask that some waiver be granted in the steward's department. I will put some more interesting information in the RECORD, but this is another case of where we do not like the bill; we are sorry for the necessity of it, but if we are going to move these people we simply have to pass this bill and I hope it will be passed.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HART] is recognized.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, the arguments for the passage of this bill are exactly similar to and of equal force with the arguments advanced in behalf of H. R. 1240. The persons who will be carried on board the ships involved in this joint resolution are mainly of a different character and engaged in different pursuits, but the situation with respect to the ships themselves and with respect to the necessity for performing the work that the ships are engaged in, is exactly on a par with the necessities discussed in connection with the bill just passed by the House.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to elaborate any further on this measure or take up any more of the time of the committee.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEICHEL].

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Chairman, the pending resolution covers the protection of American citizens transported on ships flying the flag of the United States. While there have been international conventions with reference to safety at sea and the United States has been a signatory, yet the so-called international standards of safety at sea have not been thought sufficient to protect the lives of American citizens. After the happening of each catastrophe at sea the Congress of the United States enacted laws for greater protection of American life at sea, and these protective measures have been enacted from time to time by Congress and are now enforced by the Coast Guard and set forth in the volume known as Laws Governing Marine Inspection. The purpose of this resolution is to place in the hands of the Coast Guard and give it absolute discretion to suspend the operation of every law built up by experience for the protection of American citizens riding on American-flag ships. The resolution does not provide for the suspension of a few, but it authorizes suspension of every last one, and misleads every person boarding an American-flag ship into the belief that he is riding on a ship complying with the laws of safety as enacted by the Congress of the United States, because the Coast Guard gives it sanction to sail. I do not believe that American citizens should be misled into believing they are riding on safe ships when it is absolutely the opposite. I do not believe that the Congress should so deal lightly with human life at sea, especially when these laws have been built up after years of experience and after each catastrophe at sea costing the lives of hundreds of American citizens. The excuse given in the request for the suspension of laws of safety at sea is that the War Powers Act might not be extended; that ships of other nations have lower standards and they had them when these safety laws were enacted; that Americans will ride on foreign ships; and that this country is going to take on a program of moving approximately 1,000,000 misplaced persons around the world on American-flag ships. I do not feel that these reasons are sufficient to ask the Congress to suspend laws enacted for the protection of human life at sea. Is the mere fact that foreign flags operate passenger ships with lower standards of safety than ours, that American citizens will ride on foreign ships—should that be a sufficient excuse to suspend the law of safety at sea and secretly expose without their knowledge the lives of American citizens riding on American-flag ships stamped with the approval of the Coast Guard? If civilians with full knowledge of the risks involved desire to ride on ships that do not come up to the laws of safety of the United States, it might be their privilege. However, I believe that the least that can be done with reference to civilians who have the free choice of riding is that they be informed that the ship does not comply with the laws of safety at sea. At the time of the reading of the bill I should like to offer an amendment for your consideration which might be of material assistance in saving lives of American people.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEICHEL. I yield.

Mr. HART. The gentleman knows this bill is limited in its effect to April 1, 1948.

Mr. WEICHEL. Yes; it is limited to a definite period of time.

Mr. HART. In the course of his remarks the gentleman stated that there were 1,000,000 displaced persons to be transported in American ships. The gentleman does not mean to imply does he, that those million displaced persons are to be transported on ships during the life of this bill if it is enacted into law?

Mr. WEICHEL. Most probably not. That was the suggestion at the hearings, that there might be that many displaced persons. They could not be moved in that period of time, obviously.

Mr. HART. As a matter of fact I believe that the gentleman will find that the number of displaced persons disclosed by the hearings was 800,000.

Mr. WEICHEL. I was looking at the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] and ask unanimous consent that he may speak out of order.

Then I yield the remainder of what time has been allotted to me to the distinguished gentleman from California, chairman of the subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Massachusetts may speak out of order?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, we have blithely granted a loan of $3,750,000,000 to Great Britain. But even the extreme optimists do not expect that it will ever be paid back in full. We are becoming trained to astronomical appropriations and a skyrocketing debt.

In the process, we find some strange and baffling contradictions, which seem to put our financial policy in the same class as those mysteries above human understanding.

I have just mentioned the loan to Britain, which our friends across the water may justly regard as being "pound foolish." By way of contrast, I want to mention a smaller item, which has come to my attention.

Under the immigration quota system, it appears that 17,000 Irish men and women are entitled to leave their homeland and settle in the United States—17,000 each year. Now this is a small quota, compared with that allotted to some other countries. However, having established the quota, the understanding is that our Government shall do everything in its power to cut red tape and quickly process applications, so that those who qualify, may come to this country as soon as possible.

This is the theory but not the practice.

In fact, we are defaulting on our obligations to these future citizens.

Eight thousand Irish men and women—less than half the quota—have applied for immigration visas to the United States. But these visas, to which they are entitled, are not being granted because the American consulate general in Dublin claims that his staff is too small to handle the job.

Our consulate in Ireland, now processes only 100 visas monthly, or 25 a week. By right, if 17,000 Irishmen applied for entry to the United States in 1946, they should be permitted to enter the country in 1946. At the present rate of processing, it will take 7 years for half the 1946 quota to be cleared.

This is what I mean by calling our appropriations for the consular service "penny wise" and niggardly, cheapening us in the eyes of prospective citizens who rely upon our good faith. They have complied with their obligations in the matter, but we are failing in ours.

There is much resentment in the United States as well as Ireland over this inexcusable delay in granting visas to Irish emigrants. Many Senators and Congressmen have had the exasperating experience of trying to get action on these legitimate applications, only to be told that it is impossible so long as the consulate is inadequately staffed.

The consular service is not a war-time or emergency function of Government. It is a fundamental. But it seems that we have neglected fundamentals in our preoccupation with experiments.

Perhaps it is time to pay some attention to the prosaic obligations of Government.

With this in mind, I suggest that we make a modest financial appropriation that will enable our consular service to do the job for which it was intended. If we can lend—and I use the word advisedly—if we can lend billions to other nations, surely we can appropriate a few thousands to bring our own foreign service up to that degree of respectability where it will not have to make excuses for its shortcomings.

This "penny-wise" policy for our consulates and legations, is doing us a great disservice.

It should be remedied without delay.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Mr. Chairman, we have just acted upon a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to waive certain requirements of vessel inspection laws insofar as ships operated by the War Department are concerned.

House Joint Resolution 76 now under consideration covers the same general waivers for vessels operated by private interests, whether owned either by such interests or by the United States Maritime Commission.

Title 5 of the Second War Powers Act provided that—

> The head of each Department or agency responsible for the administration of the navigation and vessel inspection laws * * * is authorized to wave compliance with such laws to such extent and in such manner and upon such terms as he may prescribe either upon his own initiative or upon the written recommendation of the head of any other Government agency, whenever he deems that such action is necessary for the conduct of the war.

As this title of the Second War Powers Act expires on March 31, 1947, all such vessels on which waivers are now being granted must be withdrawn from service on that date unless an extension of waivers is authorized and it is the purpose of this House joint resolution to bring about such authorization.

Prior to the war passenger ships under the United States flag were operating under safety regulations set up by the Congress, which regulations are more stringent than the rules of the International Convention for Safety at Sea, to which this Nation subscribes. Ships then under the American flag were taken over by the Government and largely modified to make them suitable for wartime service. In such service refinements for safety must be discarded in the pursuit of the greater aim of the transportation of troops and matériel required for the successful conduct of the war. As a result, ships which in prewar days complied with the requirements of our vessel inspection laws no longer meet these requirements and will not conform until considerable reconversions have been accomplished. It may be noted at this point that many of these ships were lost during the war, so that at the present time, even though the reconversions mentioned above were completed, the shipping facilities of the Nation would still be inadequate for the transportation of passengers in prewar passenger-carrying vessels.

A large number of vessels were built during the war, and many of these were fitted as personnel carriers. No efforts were made to bring these ships into compliance with normal vessel inspection laws, as such compliance would unfit them for their primary purpose of assisting in the exertion of our maximum efforts to achieve quick and complete victory. These ships carried great numbers of personnel during war years and since the cessation of hostilities and have had an enviable safety record.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, like other members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I voted to report this bill and am supporting it because there is nothing else we can do. The hearings disclosed that if waivers were not continued at this time, the flag of the United States Merchant Marine would have to be hauled down or at least flown at half mast. Nevertheless, some of us on the committee act in this matter with great reluctance. To me this necessity of waiving safety requirements, more than a year and a half after VJ-day, is a sharp warning of the difficulties we face in maintaining our merchant marine in a healthy, leading position on the high seas.

Frankly, I am not so concerned with the gravity of present dangers to travelers. The persons carried by our ships will be infinitely safer than those who were transported during the shooting period of the war. And our record during those years was remarkable in the small loss of life, except for that resulting from enemy action.

What I think is ominous is that there appears to be no end in sight for the need of such waivers and of the taking of such calculated risks in the months to come.

The recent fire in New York Harbor on the one-time luxury cruise ship Kungsholm, now the John Ericsson, is a timely reminder of the ever-present fire hazard. About the same time 150 lives were lost from an 800-ton overcrowded steamer on the Yangtze River. Danger is ever present on shipboard. The radio this morning reported that one of our freighters struck a mine in the Mediterranean.

If we are to maintain the prestige of the American merchant marine, we must raise rather than lower our standards.

We cannot have a "big league" fleet that is only first class when it comes to carrying freight. We must have passenger ships of high quality as well—ships that may become great troop carriers, if the need arises. But at present this passenger fleet is not in sight in adequate strength and it will not grow as long as we use makeshifts without some dead line toward which we can look with confidence as the time when we will have ample modern and safe passenger service under our flag, with which to meet our commitments.

Mr. Chairman, this is an economy-minded Congress. I am deeply glad that it is. I have little fear that we will carry economy to the point of directly hampering our armed services. We have learned our lesson in that field by now, I trust. But we must remember that the Army and Navy must be supplemented by a powerful merchant marine if we are to have real preparedness. That means that our shipbuilding industry must be kept active, that new and modern vessels must be laid down and large sums allocated for such a program. We must not look forward to seeing our merchant marine pass through a period of being forced to use obsolescent or improvised material as did our Army in the late thirties and in 1940, when broomsticks were labeled machine guns and ice trucks used to simulate tanks. In those days there was little consolation for those of us behind the wooden guns in the fact that modern equipment was on order. Today we are using freighters for passenger ships. It begins to parallel our old sad story of unpreparedness.

I urge upon this body that we must make our savings in other fields whereever we can, but we cannot afford to do with makeshifts in our merchant marine.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.].

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Chairman, after repeated statements by the President of the United States that this country desires the admission to Palestine of the Hebrew refugees now in the displaced persons camps in the western zones in Europe, and after resolutions by innumerable American organizations, both major political parties, and editorials in most newspapers to the same effect, a group of American citizens have been arrested by the British for trying to do their part in implementing that American policy.

Eighteen American seamen, members of the crew of the refugee ship Ben Hecht, are now in a Palestinian jail after having been seized last week end. The ship, American property, owned by the Tyre Shipping Co., of New York, has also been seized. It had been under charter from the Tyre Shipping Co. to the Hebrew Committee of National Liberation which conducts repatriation activities via the underground railway from Europe to Palestine.

The crew, consisting of both Jewish and non-Jewish American volunteers, is charged under local legislation with "abetting persons illegally" to immigrate to Palestine. The American League for a Free Palestine, which raised the funds with which the ship was purchased, has contended that there has been no violation of either American or international law—except by the British in their blockade of the Palestine coast. Prof. Fowler Harper, on the faculty of Yale University Law School, said 2 days ago that—

> This will be a test case in the sense that a British court will decide whether Mr. Bevin's foreign policy or international law is paramount.

The fact that the British have delayed releasing or trying the crew members for another 2 weeks pending investigation strongly indicates that they, too, are aware of the critical test nature of the case.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Tyre Shipping Co. has engaged a Haifa attorney, Mr. Joseph Kaiserman, to protect its interest in the ship and to defend the crew, which includes two Norwegian volunteer seamen. I understand, further, that both the American Department of State and the proper Norwegian authorities have been approached by representatives of the Tyre Shipping Co. regarding the safeguarding of the rights of the crew members and the protection of their interest.

Inasmuch as the rights and freedom of American citizens are now at stake and threatened by regulations which, at best, are of doubtful validity in a confused and contested situation, inasmuch as stated and confirmed American policy regarding an area which belongs to the international community, not to the British, is in direct opposition to the incumbent administration in Palestine on the issue of Hebrew entry, and inasmuch as American men manned the Ben Hecht under the impression—hardly to be disputed—that it was in furtherance of American interest and policy as stated by President Truman, as well as a daring and humane venture, I strongly urge that the Government of the United States spare no effort to protect the young seamen and to secure their immediate release. I hope that the Department of State has already thrown its resources behind them and that it will succeed in freeing the men, in securing the return of the ship to its owners, and in supporting a precedent of American action on this issue which, if followed, may well bring about a quick solution to the entire problem.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTS].

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has been hearing testimony on this and the previous bill for a long period of time, and the volumes which have been built up are truly considerable. We were worried about this whole problem just as we knew that the Members of Congress would be worried about it here on the floor, and I think that the problem is very easy of statement. It is: Are we going to drive the American merchant marine from the high seas at a time when the people who ride in American ships can get no better accommodations and no better ships from any nation in the world today? We can prevent our ships from plying the high seas, yes, we can do that, but the Queen Mary, which could not meet our standards, could still come in here, and the Queen Elizabeth could still come in here, and the ships of all the other nations of the world could come in here and bring these people, and the merchant marine would suffer an irreparable loss. That is the situation.

I think we all appreciate the great service which the Coast Guard has done for American shipping. They do not grant waivers lightly. While these ships cannot meet full American requirements, they are equally as good as the ships of these other nations that will be plying the high seas, and we know that when the Commandant of the Coast Guard gives a waiver he has assured himself that the ship is a pretty good one and reasonably well constructed to make the crossing.

In every situation, of course, there is an element of risk, but that is a calculated risk. I think the fact that American shipping has progressed to the extent it has, with the small loss of ships and lives, is due to the fact that we have a grand merchant marine. The men who man our ships are thoroughly capable. While these ships may not be up to the standard fixed by statute they are good ships, and with the men who man our ships they are reasonably safe. I think that is the problem we have before us. While we would like the American merchant marine to be superior to any other in the world, we must remember they are not the least bit worse than the ships of the other countries which now can enter our harbors.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Mr. Chairman, the waivers which this act are intended to cover will apply to the two classifications mentioned above, that is, former passenger ships converted to war purposes and which have not yet been reconstructed for peacetime service, and to war-built vessels, most of which were never intended for passenger service in normal times, and none of which can now comply with vessel inspection laws.

In general, former passenger-carrying vessels are being restored to compliance with vessel inspection laws and they will, by the end of this year, be in conformance thereto. With minor exceptions only, we have little to worry about concerning these ships, but only a very few of them are now in service, the rest being in shipyards undergoing reconversion. The ships which we must keep in operation, if we are to continue necessary passenger movements, are these war-built vessels which lack practically every vestige of comfort, or sign of suitable accommodation which we have been accustomed to expect in maritime service. Practically all of these ships are reasonably fire resistant. As they are war-built ships their interior arrangements are almost uniformly of steel, and as such, offer little fire hazard. It is true that they do not have the fire-resistant bulkheads which our laws require, neither do they have sprinkler systems, fire-detecting systems, or remote control for water-tight doors. However, the need for all of these things can be greatly mitigated by proper watches and careful supervision, and I do not consider the lack of them to be such that we should bar these vessels from carrying passengers on the sea under the present circumstances.

A reasonable number of vertical transverse bulkheads are provided and where these bulkheads are pierced by doors, such doors are normally closed before leaving port and are kept closed at sea.

In general, life-saving arrangements are inadequate because of the fact that such boats and davits as are provided were designed and installed primarily for the landing of troops either in harbors, or in reasonably sheltered locations during attacks on the beaches of our recent enemies. On this account some of these ships have lifeboats which normally require power for lifting them before they are launched and this makes them undesirable and unsatisfactory for marine disaster at sea on account of the possibility of the loss of the power supply on board ship. However, hand gear is provided for such contingencies, but it is slow and might be rather ineffective. Ample life rafts and life preservers are provided in all cases, but I am of the opinion, that the number of passengers on board should, at all times, be kept down to lifeboat capacity and that life rafts and other buoyant gear should not be included in the count of adequate life-saving facilities for these vessels while in passenger service, and I have so informed operators on every occasion.

Right here let me mention that we now have one first-class liner, the America, operating in the North Atlantic without waiver and that we have one or two other American vessels also operating in southern waters. These are admirable ships with superstandards of safety and none of the comments in these remarks apply in any way to them. I wish to make it clear also that the remarks following apply only to a number of war-built vessels which are carrying passengers on an emergency basis and possibly to some of the older ships which have not yet been reconverted.

I have inspected various ships just recently and I consider that the normal passenger accommodations now being furnished on these war-built vessels are a disgrace to the American flag and to this great Nation which owns these vessels. Except in this emergency, when transportation seems to be essential even under the most unfortunate conditions, I cannot conceive of the carrying of women and children in such accommodations, and under such atrociously uncomfortable conditions, as we are now doing. It seems to me, while recognizing the necessities of the present condition, that this Government should make every possible effort to provide, as soon as possible, a number of respectable ships for passenger-carrying service in the North Atlantic so as to put an end to the conditions which now exist.

From an examination of these ships, I believe that they are carrying far more passengers than are justified, both in view of their life-saving facilities and of their living accommodations, and I think that the number should be reduced sharply even though it may be necessary to put more ships into service, or to reduce the number of passengers carried. Let us remember that, in general, these ships are owned by the Government and that they are operated by private interests under general agency agreements. I realize that reducing the number of passengers allowed on each of such ships will materially reduce the profits accruing from each voyage, but I do not believe this Government should continue to make money from the misery, inconvenience, and lack of safety which ocean travelers must now encounter and which could be somewhat mitigated by reducing the number of people on board each ship.

In adopting this resolution your subcommittee, which has considered it, believes that it has taken the logical and correct course in placing the responsibility for the granting of waivers directly upon the authority responsible for the enforcement of vessel-inspection laws of the United States, that is, the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard. It is to be noted also that the wording of the resolution no longer directs that the Commandant of the Coast Guard shall grant waivers, but that it authorizes him to do so. As the United States Coast Guard maintains an office of Merchant Marine Safety under the direction of a chief of many years' experience, there is not the slightest reason to assume that any waivers will be granted unless they are deemed justifiable under current conditions and well within the limits of the calculated risk involved.

Right here I should like to inject the remark that quite to the contrary of public opinion, the position of the United States in the passenger-carrying traffic in the North Atlantic is pitiful indeed, and that if we are not to see ourselves almost entirely displaced from that great maritime service in which we have been an outstanding participant so many years, we must take some action without delay to strengthen our position. It would appear now that unless some such action is taken it will be only a reasonably few months before the American flag will be carried upon only one passenger ship across the lanes of the North Atlantic, and even this ship, the America, can no longer claim to be the latest and the best in naval architecture. It is my intent, within a few days, to introduce legislation to authorize and direct the Maritime Commission to construct, or cause to be constructed, two ships for service in this North Atlantic trade—two ships which will be the equal of anything now afloat or under construction.

It is my sincere hope that the Congress may become sufficiently aware of the disastrous situation which must soon confront us in the North Atlantic so that legislation may be adopted to put American superliners into the North Atlantic trade.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation must be enacted by Congress if the passenger-carrying segment of the American merchant marine is to survive the crisis which now confronts it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That effective April 1, 1947, the Commandant, United States Coast Guard, is authorized and directed to waive compliance with the navigation and vessel-inspection laws administered by the Coast Guard to the extent and in such manner and upon such terms as may be deemed necessary by him in the conduct of the war or the orderly reconversion of the merchant marine from wartime to peacetime operations.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "and directed."

Page 1, line 8, after the word "in" strike out "the conduct of the war."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The authority granted by this resolution shall remain in force only until January 1, 1948.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, strike out "January 1, 1948" and insert "April 1, 1948."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan: On page 2, line 2, after the words "April 1, 1948," strike out the period and insert "Provided, That after June 1, 1947, the Commandant shall not waive compliance with those sections of the navigation and vessel inspection laws requiring employment of American citizens as officers and crew members, and limiting the employment of aliens except insofar as such employment shall be in the steward's department of vessels authorized to carry in excess of 12 passengers."

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use all the time. This is the amendment to which I referred earlier in my remarks on this bill. I may say for the information of the House that the words "12 passengers" are put in the amendment because a ship is not a passenger ship, in the eyes of the regulations, until it carries more than 12 passengers. We have a certain number of cargo vessels that are designed to carry 12 passengers or less and they are not regarded as passenger ships.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. Will that be enough seamen to serve on the American ships?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I understand there are plenty of seamen. There are many of them on the beach today—good loyal American citizens—who are being forced out of our merchant marine by the continued employment of all these aliens. They make life so miserable for them on board ship that they cannot serve with them.

Mr. BLAND. I would be in sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman if assured that the facts justified the amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I believe the principal difficulty is in the steward's department only.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. HART. I feel somewhat the same as the distinguished former chairman of the committee [Mr. BLAND]. I feel that I do not have enough information with respect to the gentleman's amendment to vote intelligently upon it. The gentleman himself has stated he has had the benefit of conversations with labor leaders and officials of the Government, but I have had none and as far as I know, most of the members of the committee have had none. I would much prefer to act upon an amendment of this nature, if it were desirable at all, after the information and facts had been submitted to the committee for further consideration.

I shall not oppose the amendment but I do think that the offering of it at this time and under these circumstances is at least a bit ill-advised.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. I have had the matter up with the unions, with the operators, with the Coast Guard officials, and with the Maritime officials. They are all in favor of it. The big hazard that the Coast Guard fears in the continued employment of a large quantity of aliens, especially on the deck, is due to the fact that a lot of those men, despite the law, do not speak the English language, and in the event of a calamity, where it is necessary to launch and use lifeboats, the officers or crew who do not speak their language, cannot control those men. That is the greatest hazard, and the Coast Guard is very much concerned about it.

I am sorry I did not have this alien matter called to my attention when the bill was before the committee, but it was called to my attention afterward.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEICHEL: On page 2, after the words "January 1, 1948", insert:

"SEC. 3. All passengers shall be notified in writing prior to embarkation of all waivers of the navigation and vessel-inspection laws which have been granted for the vessel on which they are about to sail."

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Chairman, we have discussed here this afternoon the great need for waivers. Everyone seems to have been taken into consideration, except the American citizen who is about to ride overseas. There is no provision in this resolution whereby the American citizen before he boards the ship shall be informed what risk he is taking. I do not understand why it should be a secret, why the Coast Guard should not inform the prospective passenger that he is about to ride on a ship that is not safe according to the laws enacted by the Congress. There seems to be some idea that the prospective passenger should not know that there is a waiver on the ship. There seems to be some idea that he should not be informed and some idea that if the Coast Guard permits a ship to sail and waives the safety laws, the prospective passenger should not know that fact.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEICHEL. If the gentleman will permit me to continue for a minute, then I shall be glad to yield.

I see no reason why, if the Congress wants to authorize the Coast Guard to waive safety laws, there should be objection to informing prospective passengers so that they may make their own choice as to whether or not they want to ride on such a ship. This amendment gives the passenger the knowledge on which he can make a choice as to whether he wants to risk his life or not.

I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman include in his amendment that the passenger shall also be furnished with a statement that he cannot get on any ship anywhere in the world, under any flag, that will be as safe as a ship that flies the American flag?

Mr. WEICHEL. They could give them that as additional information and if they still want to take the risk then it is all right; but I think they should be informed.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this case is very much the same as going to the doctor. It is a highly technical affair. There is not 1 person in 10,000 who would have the slightest idea about what most of these waivers were.

We have a perfectly competent Coast Guard to take care of it. We have set up in the Coast Guard a division of maritime safety. Their work is to look out for the safety of the American people. We have officers in that service who have devoted their lifetime to that kind of work. They are looking out for the safety of the American people and will not issue waivers beyond what they feel must be taken as a calculated risk.

When you go to a doctor and he prescribes for you it is on what he knows about your condition. When you buy a ticket on a ship on which a waiver has been granted, there is exactly the same condition.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. You have exactly the same thing in everyday life in connection with building safety codes where waivers have to be issued. There are any number of apartment houses, hotels, and office buildings right here in Washington today that do not meet our safety standards and fire-inspection requirements, yet they are given waivers.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield.

Mr. HART. As a matter of fact, there was testimony before the committee that in practically all cases the Coast Guard does now so advise prospective passengers that the ship does not measure up to all the safety standards.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. May I advise the gentleman from New Jersey that the Coast Guard does not. The passengers buy their tickets in all parts of the United States at ticket offices of these various steamship agencies, and the passengers have no knowledge other than that the ship has been passed or allowed to sail by our Inspection Service.

Mr. HART. There was some testimony from some official before our committee—I cannot recall just now who it was, to the effect that prior to the departure of these ships the passengers were advised that they did not come up to the standards.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. My recollection is that the thought was it could be done. I agree it could be done.

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. POTTS. My recollection from the hearings is that waivers were asked only on ships carrying displaced persons who were being moved by the Government; that in those cases the displaced persons were required to sign a waiver which absolved the Government of all responsibility if they chose to accept the accommodations offered and be brought to another country.

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I do not recall that that is in effect.

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. May I ask the gentleman, who is an old sea captain: Would it not defeat the very idea of safety if passengers were put aboard a ship loaded down with the doctrine that something was wrong with it? Might it not make it harder for the ship's officers to handle them if there were an emergency at sea?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Personally, I think it would be very poor policy and very poor judgment to get these passengers up before you and tell them that one of the watertight doors in the ship did not have the proper remote control or, possibly, that the smoke indicator in hold C–4 or C–5 was not in order. Most of the waivers are relatively small. The larger ones, I think, are essential. As I said, I do not believe the passenger would know what they are anyway, I do not think it would do them any good, and the amendment, if adopted, would cause nothing but confusion and bring not one iota of safety to anybody.

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WEICHEL. Does not the gentleman think the passenger should make the choice as to whether he rides or wants to ride?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I do not. I do not think he is competent to make it.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. The passenger would have to ride on the vessel if he rode at all, would he not?

Mr. BRADLEY of California. Only military passengers have to ride and that is covered by the previous bill, may I say to the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, we who serve on the Appropriations Committee are continuously running into conditions that, on the face of them, appear to call for legislation. Appropriations, of course, is not a policy or legislative committee. It is for that reason that I desire to bring to your attention and to the attention of the Members of this body a matter which I believe necessitates our taking corrective action. A saving in money, morale, and materials would appear to be a possibility. Those three "m's" are important in peace as well as in war.

Last week the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the District of Columbia held hearings for the justification of a supplemental appropriation involving a request by the Board of Public Welfare for the District of Columbia government.

Now, there can be no doubt that the matter of providing funds for the assistance and rehabilitation of certain bodies of our citizens, who, because of many circumstances often beyond their individual control, must look to some form of public or private assistance as rightly the concern of government. Several years ago this proper function of government was recognized, and this House, in cooperation with our colleagues in the Senate, and with the able counsel of several Federal agencies and many private relief and welfare organizations throughout the Nation, devised legislation that would meet an insistent need to provide for the security and well-being of our needy and worthy citizens.

Largely this legislation was effected through the Social Security Act of 1935. I believe I reflect the wisdom of this present Congress when I say that the efficiency and soundness of the intent and principle behind this legislation has proved itself during these subsequent years.

I want to call to your attention, Mr. Chairman, facts developed in the hearings to which I have already referred, which, while dealing with a purely local and District matter, are basically reflective of a situation national in its scope.

Prior to 1932 there was no such thing in the District of Columbia as appropriations for public welfare. Up to that time, those who were in need of total subsistence, or those needing subsistence allowances to augment limited personal earnings, were dependent upon private charitable and welfare organizations.

In June of the depression year of 1932, when there was widespread local unemployment, Congress appropriated $350,000 for "emergency relief of residents of the District of Columbia" and subsequently two additional appropriations totaling $1,150,000 in the fiscal year 1933 were granted.

Since that time, public relief in varying amounts, has become a fixed item in the District bill. For the coming fiscal year the request is based on an estimated need of $646,000 carried under the title in the appropriation bill as "General public assistance."

In the District of Columbia welfare program, general public assistance receives no Federal matching fund. However, two other forms of public assistance resulted from national legislation for grants-in-aid, dependent for their administration upon augmenting Federal funds. One is for old-age assistance, amounting to $513,000 a year; the other for aid to the blind at $53,000—these sums from District of Columbia revenues, I repeat, being matched by Federal allotments.

In addition, the District's share of grants for dependent children increased from $225,000 in 1933 to $607,000 estimated for next year. These sums of money, Mr. Chairman, you will recognize as sizable items in the District of Columbia total budget of approximately $90,000,000. All of these items, Mr. Chairman, are being granted today without specific legislation, either authorizing them or setting up proper administrative methods, and this situation obtains throughout the Nation.

I believe you will agree with me that the operation has been tested for enough years to warrant proper corrective legislation at this time. And as we deal with the aspect of what shall be the proper legislation, we come to the matter that is of national, as well as local, concern.

Mr. Chairman, we took the first great step forward in the early 30's when we saw to it that the Federal Government accepted a responsibility for maintaining those who were down-and-out by granting financial assistance. So far, however, we have failed to consider the second great step—the rehabilitation of those individuals involved in relief and welfare programs so that in the quickest possible time they could be taken off the relief rolls and returned to productive useful life.

It appears to me to be the appropriate time for Congress to consider carefully whether a system of monthly payments, given to unemployable indigents in our many communities through the Nation, and designed originally to alleviate distress in an emergency, is to become a regular function of Government in good times as well as in bad.

Operating as it has in these last years of large-employment opportunity, and unusual earning capacity as well, the system has created a way of life for that class of people who readily and easily go on relief and depend entirely for subsistence on monthly checks from some public fund. Flagrant and sensational cases of abuse have come to our attention.

Now, we have no particular quarrel with this system insofar as it represents the effort of Government to provide relief as an emergency measure for those who must have relief in several forms. We do, however, have serious question whether the system provides more at present than simply a permanent way of life. Here in the District and throughout the Nation there is a demand for civic improvements, progress programs, and so forth. The cost of these comes necessarily from the same budget as relief. Obviously ways to end as well as serve relief are needed.

The time has come for us to accept this second responsibility and devise the means of meeting it. A public clamor has been raised across the Nation concerning certain abuses in our welfare systems. There is a demand that this Congress review the provisions of the social security law so that relief cannot for any person become simply a way of life.

May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that the most essential fact in this regard, made evident by the situation existing in the District of Columbia, is that the problem of rehabilitation is one that must be met locally in each community, and that we must give to our welfare administrators on that local level the means and the authority to undertake their task with a much wider degree of flexibility than now granted them under the provisions of the Social Security Act.

We cannot simply make a grant of funds from the Federal Treasury or from any other public treasury and then take no heed of what becomes of those moneys. Neither can we any longer allow set rules to be made by local officials, administering Federal funds, when these rules are not flexible enough to meet the judgment of workers handling individual cases.

This is not alone the job for the subcommittee on District of Columbia appropriations. Yet it often seems that, in addition to the seven very able members on that committee, all too few in the District are actively concerned.

Mr. Chairman, the Members of Congress cannot bring individuals back to self-respect by merely passing laws; but trained workers operating on the local levels can undertake this task. Federal welfare, I believe, may profitably be compared to fire engines: Fire engines by their very nature must not be used on frivolous occasions but they must be ready to meet any sort of emergency upon a minute's notice. But we must, as citizens, beware of false alarms in the extension of relief aid. Immediate dismissal should be the fate of any welfare worker who falsely or unnecessarily extended aid.

Moreover, it is paramount that we concentrate on fire-prevention programs to make the use of fire engines almost negligible. Simple and perfunctory cooperation with the assessor's office, with the penal institutions, and with employment agencies of all types should prove vastly corrective of abuses. By the same token that welfare programs are essential in our community, they, too, must be ready for every emergency but must never be abused.

Mr. Chairman, I urgently ask that the Members of this Congress acquaint themselves with the facts as they exist in their own communities and on the basis of that information consider ways of plugging the loopholes in our present national social security laws—of broadening local control in the administration of these laws—and, most important, effecting programs that will make the rehabilitation of persons the criterion of all our efforts.

To further show the interest in this matter I ask permission to include at this point an editorial from the March 11 Washington Evening Star and from the March 12 Washington Post.

I should comment, however, that both the work and the information before the subcommittee was by no means superficial as indicated by the Post editorial.

[From the Washington Evening Star of March 11, 1947]

TIME TO REVIEW THE SYSTEM

Chairman HORAN, of the House Subcommittee on District Appropriations, has pointed out some incidents of waste in public relief which he attributes to the system rather than to inefficiency of individuals. He wants the leaks plugged. He is constructive in his criticism, the relief authorities agree with much of what he says, and something may be done about it.

But the broader question relates to where we are going with a public-assistance program, relatively new as a function of Government, which has never received legislative authorization beyond the allotment of funds in appropriation bills. The sums spent each year on public relief are substantial items in the District budget. It is time that the whole system be subjected to careful study by the District legislative committees and that we cease depending on annual improvization through appropriation bills.

Prior to 1932 there was no such thing in the District as appropriations for "public relief." Up to that time families in distress were the wards of private charitable and welfare organizations. In June of the depression year of 1932, when there was widespread local unemployment, Congress appropriated $350,000 for "emergency relief of residents," following it up with two deficiency appropriations which made a total of $1,150,000 in the fiscal year 1933. The money, known as general public assistance, goes to those considered unemployable. It has become an annual charge, a fixture in the District bill. For the next fiscal year the estimate is $646,000.

In the meantime, two other forms of public assistance resulted from national legislation for grants-in-aid. One is for old-age assistance, amounting to about $513,000 a year, the other for aid to the blind, $53,000, these sums from local revenue matching Federal allotments. In addition, the District's share of grants for dependent children has increased from $225,000, in 1933, to $607,000 estimated for next year.

The first category—general public assistance—is paid entirely from local revenues, with no help from Federal funds. It is the largest expenditure and there has never been specific legislation authorizing it or setting up administrative methods. Everything has been done through appropriation bills. Legislation is advisable for two reasons.

First, there should be careful consideration whether a system of monthly payments to unemployable indigents, designed originally to alleviate distress in an emergency, is to become a regular function of Government in good times as well as bad. The system has already created a new way of life for the class of people who go on relief and depend for subsistence on monthly checks from public funds. The worst feature is the lack of any real program of rehabilitation designed to rid the rolls of those who may get on.

In the second place, if unemployable indigents are to become permanent public charges, we should set up foolproof machinery for relief administration. Last year a bill establishing administrative methods for general public assistance was introduced, but failed of enactment. It is up again this year. Mr. HORAN's criticism of the system as rotten should bring it up for consideration.

[From the Washington Post of March 12, 1947]

BUNGLING RELIEF SYSTEM

There is no question as to the necessity for extensive overhauling of the District's welfare system. But we suspect that there will be little concurrence in the local community with Representative Horan's proposals. His chief aim seems to be to change Congress' own policy under which old-age assistance funds and aid to dependent children and to the blind are granted as a matter of right. He thinks there should be a checking up on the spending of such funds after they have been granted. But that would be contrary to the spirit of the Social Security Act and, in our opinion, to sound administration of funds of this character.

In the administration of general public assistance funds, care must be taken, of course, not to continue supporting employable persons if jobs are available to them. But experts who have surveyed the District's relief system say that abuses of this sort are negligible. Rather, the chief difficulty is of a different nature. No emergency relief, it seems, can be given, for it takes a month to check on an application for aid and possibly several weeks more for a pre-audit of each individual case by the District auditor before funds can actually be spent. A system thus tangled in red tape could not possibly function efficiently. Its defeat is obviously lack of flexibility rather than too much of it.

We hope that the House will attempt to bring some order out of this maladroit system. But let the District Committee first get all the facts and clearly visualize the handicaps under which the local welfare officials have been working. We are confident that the only basic solution is the creation of a new department of welfare in a District government responsible to the people. But meanwhile some intermediate improvements will doubtless have to be devised. And certainly the House Appropriation Subcommittee, which is looking into this matter from a superficial viewpoint, will have to grant the requested deficiency appropriation in order to save hundreds of local families from acute hunger between now and next July 1.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to endorse thoroughly the statement made by the gentleman from California [Mr. BRADLEY]. The adoption of the pending amendment to the bill will impose impossible tasks upon the Coast Guard. When we had an appropriation bill up for consideration the other day there was talk about what the Coast Guard was doing and what grandiose work it was undertaking. The Coast Guard was simply performing tasks that we had imposed upon it.

Now, they want to send around an agent of the Coast Guard to every man who buys a ticket and tell him what waiver has been allowed on a particular ship. The passenger does not know what it is or what it is all about. When we give him the judgment of selection, that is sufficient, whether he rides or not. He has no choice. If he rides on any other ship he has to ride on a foreign ship if we do not grant this waiver, and if he rides on a foreign ship, the testimony is that he is riding on a ship that is less safe than the American ships.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEICHEL].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GAMBLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 76) authorizing and directing the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to waive compliance navigation and vessel-inspection laws administered by the Coast Guard, pursuant to House Resolution 130, he reported the joint resolution back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to waive compliance with the navigation and vessel-inspection laws administered by the Coast Guard."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE GREEK SITUATION

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a telegram, signed by Joseph Myerson, chairman of the Eastern Pennsylvania Progressive Citizens of America, which takes violent issue with the message of the President on the Greek matter. I have not yet fully made up my mind as to the merits of the President's proposal on the Greek matter, but this effort on behalf of Henry Wallace's PCA crowd in criticism of the President will go far toward inclining me to the belief that what the President has said is true.

In principle, we certainly must support the right of free people to maintain free governments everywhere by moral and economic aid. The degree of that support is what concerns me. I do not know whether the amount which the President requests is excessive; it may be that he has asked for too much and it may be that to implement his program would merely provide a haven for a number of displaced jobholders who hop like fleas from one Government agency to another. So I want to examine further into the degree to which we should commit ourselves in these matters and the extent to which we must be prepared to go. The fact that the friends of communism, led by Henry Wallace's red-flag boys in the PCA, have rushed in to berate the President and to impugn his motives shows that the Communists fear a firm stand on the part of our Government and their stooges in the left wing are ready to do battle for the Red cause. These are the same people who flourished under the New Deal and in New Deal jobs for many years. Those who are now out of the Government may be expected to cooperate with those left-wingers still inside the Government to divide and sabotage any firm stand against communism.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROONEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by H. G. Richey.

Mr. HORAN asked and was given permission to include in the remarks he made today two editorials.

AN EASILY WORKABLE TAX CUT WITH GENERAL RELIEF—H. R. 2539

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point and include a small table on a tax bill which I have introduced today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am no tax expert. To me, the Internal Revenue Code is an awesome and wonderful thing. I never expect to get beyond the stage where I study tax schedules with fear and trembling. But we all pay taxes. We all struggle with tax returns. You have to think about them whether you want to do so or not.

One of my constituents is an accountant who works on tax returns. He is a very clear-thinking individual and works with taxes at the grass roots. Two days ago I received a suggestion from him which appeared to be so practical and helpful that I thought it should be placed before the Congress.

Accordingly, I reduced the suggestion to the form of a bill and have introduced it today under this title: "A bill to reduce all individual income-tax payments one-twentieth by reducing the rate 5 percent on taxable income; and, to further reduce taxes for those with dependents by increasing the exemptions for a spouse and dependents from $500 to $700."

I am advised that its number will be H. R. 2539.

As the title suggests, the bill proposes a primarily simple credit against the current tax of an amount equal to one-twentieth of one's taxable net income.

The effect is to give a somewhat larger percentage tax relief for the taxpayers in the smaller brackets and still give substantial relief to those in the middle and upper brackets on an equitable basis—the same rule to be applied to everybody, but a rule which gives relief in proportion to income ability.

The trouble with some tax-relief proposals, as I understand it, is that in an attempt to treat everyone alike they give the relief in proportion to taxes paid rather than in proportion to ability to pay. This proposal avoids that difficulty. It is very easy to figure because it reduces the present tax by $5 for every $100 of taxable income.

The other part of the bill adds a little more tax relief to those who have dependents, either a spouse or children. Anyone who pays family household bills these days is aware that income earners who provide for more than one person out of a single income have a harder job to make ends meet than those who have a full income for one person alone. This situation is recognized in H. R. 2539 by increasing the exemption for the spouse or any dependent from the present $500 to $700, an increase of $200 which is deductible from total income to determine the net income for tax purposes.

Most proposals to effect tax reduction that have approached the problem by raising exemptions have done so by raising the personal exemption for the first taxpayer as well as the wife or the dependents. One objection made to that is that it is desirable to keep the tax base fairly broad and let everyone share in the burden; that increasing the personal exemption lifts too many taxpayers out of the tax-paying class altogether.

H. R. 2539 does not do that. It leaves the personal exemption for the taxpaying income at $500 where it now is, but increases the exemption for additional persons living on that income by $200. The effect is to give a very substantial relief for the taxpayers in the lowest brackets without serious effect on the Nation's revenue.

The simplest way to see what the net effect of these proposals is, is to look at a table which, with the consent of the House, I will place in the RECORD at this point—figures show taxes payable for net surtax income given at left:

Taxable income	Present tax	Straight 20 per-cent cut	Relief proposed by H. R. 2539
			1/20 on net	1 dependent	2 dependents
$100	$20	$16	$15	0	0
$200	40	32	30	0	0
$300	60	48	45	$15	0
$400	80	64	60	30	0
$500	100	80	75	45	$15
$600	120	96	90	60	30
$700	140	112	105	75	45
$800	160	128	120	90	60
$900	180	144	135	105	75
$1,000	200	160	150	120	90
$2,000	400	320	300	270	240
$4,000	840	672	640	596	544
$6,000	1,360	1,088	1,060	1,008	956
$10,000	2,640	2,112	2,140	2,072	2,014
$50,000	26,820	21,456	24,320	24,176	24,032
$100,000	67,320	53,840	62,320	62,146	61,972
$200,000	156,820	125,456	136,820	136,640	136,460

As will be seen, the plan proposed in H. R. 2539 gives substantial tax relief to taxpayers all along the line. Below the $10,000 income, the relief is importantly greater than that afforded by the so-called straight-across-the-board 20-percent plan. Above the $10,000 line, where taxpaying ability is obviously greater, the actual tax cut is not so great as under the other plan, but still a substantial reduction is effected.

And at the same time the taxpayers all along the line will be still contributing a pretty fair chunk of their income into reduction of the national debt brought on by the war.

One feature of this idea that appealed to me is that it offers a relatively easy method of figuring the reduction—$5 for each $100 of taxable income, plus the exemption change for dependents. You do not have to know the different rates for the single taxpayer. It is a flat one-twentieth of each $100 of the income he pays on and that is $5.

And that seems fair—application of a tax cut which is proportioned to the taxpayer's ability to pay, rather than proportioned to his tax rate.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, I am not a tax expert and there may be some flaws in this proposal, technical and otherwise, but it has several points to commend it, and for that reason I have offered it for the consideration of the Ways and Means Committee and the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

WILL OUR FOREIGN POLICY DESTROY US?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, we have been giving billions of dollars and millions of tons of munitions of war, of farm machinery badly needed by our own people, to Russia. She has used the things we gave her to increase her military power.

We have been giving billions of dollars to Great Britain to bolster up a Socialist government which, in England, has destroyed free enterprise by taking over private industry.

We have a national debt and Federal expenditures which require of every American 2 days of work out of every 6.

For the past 10 years, the New Deal administration has harbored, encouraged, and placed in positions of power the Communists who have openly advocated the overthrow of this Government by force.

Well do I recall the day when Mrs. Roosevelt, to belittle the efforts of the Dies committee to expose and root out communism, came to the House Office Building as the sponsor of a group of Communists.

The State Department, there is every reason to believe, has been shot through and through with Communists who exert their influence to adversely affect our interests in foreign lands.

The National Labor Relations Board, over the years, wittingly or unwittingly, through design or ignorance, has given aid and comfort to CIO labor unions whose policies were dominated by Communists.

Yesterday the President, coming before Congress without even making an estimate as to the cost or our ability to successfully carry on a third world war, asked support for a policy which he indirectly admitted would involve us in a third world war.

We fought the First World War to end all war. By bitter experience, we learned that objective was unobtainable.

We fought the Second World War, so we were told, to carry the "four freedoms" to the uttermost parts of the world. Instead, we aided in enslaving the people of Poland, of Finland, of other nations. We delivered hundreds of thousands of prisoners taken by the American Armies into the hands of the British, the French, and the Russians, who have made slaves of them—prisoners who today are slaves.

First we aid England to establish socialism; then, when it fails, we are asked to rush to her aid to maintain a lifeline of the British Empire, which holds millions of people in bondage.

We aid Russia and destroy Germany. We condone and we sanction communism here in our own land and in our own Government. Then we propose, by our money, our munitions of war, and our armed forces, to stop it at the Greek and the Turkish borders.

If, to satisfy the desire of a group of statesmen who proclaim that they are bipartisan in foreign policy; if, to further the interests of the international munition makers; if, to haul down the Stars and Stripes and run up the flag of United Nations or an international rag of any hue or size, our young men and our young women are to fight another war, let us not be deceived by any false notion that that war is to be fought for humanity. Let us recognize it for what it is—the age-old desire of an Alexander or a Napoleon to conquer the world. Only this time the so-called world statesmen, all puffed up by their own fancied importance, cannot decide as to which of them is to be the leader, is to wear the crown and the purple robe.

Because I believe in America, that her interests in my heart should ever be first, I have been called a Fascist, a seditionist, unpatriotic, disloyal. Those things matter not at all if I can in some small way contribute to the effort to keep us out of a third world war; to the effort to avoid surrendering our sovereignty to an international organization.

How silly and how stupid it is to talk about fighting communism at the Turkish or the Greek frontier, fighting it all over the Eastern Hemisphere, then putting at the head of the organization which here in America controls what is said to be the most effective weapon of war, the atomic bomb, a man who was either so inattentive or so deliberately careless of what transpired within his own organization as to permit there to develop a Communist cell—a group who adhered to a party which advocates the overthrow of this Government by force.

Lilienthal may possess all of the intelligence, all of the executive ability attributed to him. Yes; he may have twice all that, but with a Communist cell within his organization, whether they were there because of his lack of attention to his duties or for some other reason, the fact that they were there should be sufficient, in my humble judgment, to bar him from the position to which he was nominated.

How inconsistent for the President to call upon us, not only for money and for supplies, but to follow a course which means the drafting of millions of Americans to fight communism 3,500 miles from home and then to insist upon the appointment as the head of the organization which will control the world's most powerful destructive weapon a man who did not prevent the growth of communism here in one of the Government's largest industrial plants.

What sort of muddled thinking clogs the judgment of Republicans who, November last, were given a mandate to clean out the New Deal, which now finds them supporting an enthusiastic New Dealer? The greater the ability of Lilienthal, the more reason why he, a New Dealer, should be subject to the mandate of the people as expressed November 5 last.

Republican officeholders were not elected by New Deal votes, by the votes of the Communists, nor should they perpetuate the New Deal. That is just what is being done in altogether too many instances. Calling it bipartisan support of a foreign policy does not excuse it.

In the opinion of many, it is unfortunate that the question of Lilienthal's confirmation does not rest with the people's representatives in the House. There Republicans have a real, not a paper, majority.

THE REMEDY?

It is time for the people's representatives to get down to earth. It is time for them to admit and act upon the fact that 60,000,000 workers cannot feed, clothe, build shelter for, 200,000,000 people.

It is time that we realize and act upon the realization that, if we are to engage in continuous warfare to establish our form of government all over the world, we will destroy ourselves.

It is time for us to set our house here at home in order. It is time for us to provide the remedy for labor disputes or at least to prescribe just and equitable rules under which those most interested—employee and employer—can settle their arguments.

It is time for us to embark upon a program of economy and efficiency. It is time for us to begin to make payments on our national debt; to inaugurate a program which will lessen the tax burden of our people.

It is time that we reestablish here in America our constitutional form of government; get rid of the little dictators in the Federal Government who, by order and directive, seek from day to day to deprive the citizen of his liberty, of his opportunity to contribute to the national welfare.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING

My attention was distracted as I came in by this picture in this afternoon's edition of the Times-Herald. There is a picture of a lovely, lovely lady of great intellectual attainment. I understand she will speak this afternoon, and just how foolhardy I am you gentlemen will all realize when you understand that I speak first, and that as always the woman has the last word. But in the picture there she is bending over a counter on which are piled groceries she has just purchased. "Congresswoman gets the goods on the high cost of living," reads the headline.

There is no question but that living costs are going up. There is no question but that the closed shop and the labor monopoly have increased the cost of everything that man buys. There is everywhere a demand for a higher wage. The workingmen in my district get a weekly take-home check of $32 or $35.

I will say to the lady who sits here on the right that some of these men with wives and some with wives and several children, complained to me, and justly so, that they cannot buy the goods that the lady has on the counter there, on the wage they get. Under the New Deal there are two or three items there, such as butter and Crisco, yes, and several more, which we could not get at all while we had the OPA, the continuance of which she evidently intends to advocate. Those articles were not on the market at any price. There was a scarcity of many others.

Talk about high wages and the high cost of living, yes; I saw a statement before the Committee on Labor a little while ago when I was there about the starvation wages of $20 a week back in 1920. On Sunday night I happened to be in the Library Annex looking over some old files of Detroit newspapers. I saw that you could take a round trip up the island of Mackinac and back for less than $7. I saw that you could buy a bedstead of brass and mattress and springs for less than $8. I saw that you could buy four oak chairs for less than $6. Believe it or not. I didn't believe it when I saw it, but then I looked again. There it was in cold print in the Detroit News, the Detroit Free Press, the Detroit Times. I saw all of those things advertised there at what seemed impossibly low prices.

Starvation wages? Yes. Some of us worked, and I mean we worked, for $12 a week. It was not a starvation wage at that time. We paid 6 cents a dozen for eggs and 6 cents a pound for meat, and I bought round steak instead of sirloin or porterhouse at the same price because there was less bone in the round.

Now, think of it. The question today is not how much is in the pay check. The question is: What will it buy and why are the prices high? Prices are high because, comparatively speaking, there is more money than there are things to buy. Everyone knows that. Talk about pork being high? Sure, it is high. How long ago was the administration advocating the killing of, and actually killing little pigs and old sows? How long ago was it that Henry Wallace and his school of thought said, "Plow under the cotton." He told me that I should use only so many acres of my land to grow wheat. Yet, the lady will complain about the high cost of bread. Some folks do not realize that you have to plow; you have to sow, and plant; you have to cultivate; you have to harvest; you have to take the produce to the mill.

Oh, this New Deal—sugar? Back in 1935 over in room 1705 in the New House Office Building a group of Republicans from Michigan gathered there in the office of our beloved friend and leader, Carl Mapes, to plead with Henry Wallace who had not yet thought of a pint of milk for everyone in the wide, wide world, and who was then engaged in carrying out his theories. We were gathered there to plead with him for an opportunity to increase the supply of sugar. In my district we wanted instead of 5,000 acres to plant sugar beets to increase it to 6,200 acres because the factory could operate more efficiently and because additional farmers wanted to grow sugar beets. Henry sent up two little men. They came up and said to us, "You cannot have any more acreage in Allegan and Ottawa Counties to grow sugar beets."

We said, "Why?"

"Because, Mr. HOFFMAN, we can grow sugar beets in Colorado with a higher sugar content than you can in Michigan. We are going to grow sugar beets in Colorado and not in Michigan."

I said, "What about my farmers?"

He said, "Oh, they can grow celery or cabbage or caulifiower or something else."

Isn't that fine under our theory of government?

Then I said, "They can make cane sugar down in Louisiana cheaper than they can produce beet sugar in Colorado."

He said, "You are right; how did you know it?"

Well, I did not answer that question. I said, "They can produce sugar cheaper in Florida than they can in Louisiana."

He said, "That is right. Ultmately we are going to grow cane and produce sugar in the offshore areas because it can be done cheaper there than anywhere else."

I said, "Is that your theory—wherever a thing can be grown, produced cheaper, you are going to have it done there all over the world?"

He said, "Yes, sir."

These smart men from Henry Wallace down said, "Yes." Then, perhaps foolishly, I said to him, "If that is your theory of life, why don't you have the Chinamen produce and educate all the children? They can do it cheaper than we can."

He said, "You are crazy."

I said, "So are you." Because that is the logical end of their doctrine. This New Deal has brought us just exactly what the lady from California will say—and what she will not say—scarcity. It has brought you higher prices. It has brought you hungry workingmen and the hungry wives and children of hungry workingmen. Yet they go on in their blind way, and on top of it would, with the aid of bipartisan statesmen, add another war, until the American citizens, who prior to the coming of the New Deal had lived in freedom, prosperity, and happiness, will find themselves in dire want. Yes. That is what the New Deal has brought us to and that is what they will give us if you follow the theory of my colleague from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS].

The Member from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS] will shortly take the floor to talk for half an hour about the high cost of various items, about the high cost of living in general.

She has not made any great discovery. School children, if they stop to think, know that the laws of supply and demand control prices; that an excessive spending of money always sends prices skyrocketing; that the lack of a desire to work creates a scarcity; that relief from the Government creates dependency, contributes to a lack of production.

For more than 12 years, her party, the party of the New Deal, was in complete control of every branch of the Government. It loaded down the Federal pay roll with hundreds of thousands of employees for whom it had no work. By its orders and its directives it hampered and it hindered and it restricted production. It told the people what to do, when to do it, and how to do it.

Financially, economically, productively, the New Deal ruined us and now that their chickens are coming home to roost, now that she and all of us are reaping the harvest which she helped sow, she comes to the well of the House and cries about the high cost of living.

She does not like the chickens that hatched out of the eggs the New Deal laid. The vicious circle which they started whirling, in which they have been caught—high wages and still higher prices, leaving the wage earners always as the chief sufferer.

The New Dealers can weep and shout over the wreckage they have caused, but they lack the courage to make the sacrifices, do the work necessary to bring better days.

A LETTER TO OUR LAWMAKERS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include an address to the Congress of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON]?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President of the United States delivered a very serious and extremely important message to the Congress. Most of us, I am sure, realize the very great responsibility we have, not only to our districts, to our country, and to the world, and I am sure we hope and pray that God will give us the wisdom to meet that great responsibility. However, there are times when, perhaps, we should be reminded of that responsibility as it affects our times and the world in which we live. Apropos of this, I insert in the RECORD at this point an article I read recently which is addressed to the Congress of the United States and which, I believe, should be given consideration by every Member who believes, as I do, that the world is looking to the Congress of the United States for world leadership:

[From Cosmopolitan magazine of March 1947]

A LETTER TO OUR LAWMAKERS FROM PAUL GALLICO

To the Congress of the United States of America, the Honorable Senators and Representatives, the Capitol, Washington, D. C.

SIRS AND MESDAMES: This day of approaching spring in the Capital of our Nation I am writing to you as an American citizen.

The bursting of the cherry buds into blossom signals the rebirth of the land, the reawakening of love in the hearts of men. Love your country, you who sit in the high places, for if you do not we are lost.

Love it with passion, sincerity, and deep feeling for the land and its people. Give us, this approaching Eastertide, the secure feeling that in your midst are men and women who cherish the concept of the Nation.

Republicans or Democrats, Senators or Representatives, demagogs or statesmen, wise men or fools, you are our shields against the adversities and dangers that beset the land in which we make our homes. If in your hearts there is room only for self, for ambition, local pride, jealousy and spite, there is no hope for any of us who are not merely citizens of a village or town, farm patch or city ward, district or metropolis, county or State, but citizens of a Union of people, and neighbors in a land called America.

When will you who represent us also become Americans? When will you learn to love this country, North, East, South, West, the high, the middle, and the low, as you love the streets and villages where you were born? When will you end the quarrels for petty party advantage that leave us heartsick and sore and disillusioned as you squabble and bicker for the gain of the little corner from which you come? When will you reward those who send you to high office in the councils of the Nation with simple patriotism and love of country?

Are you smiling? Is this naive, oversimple, and innocent?

I once knew an innocent man who helped to win a war. Never mind his name. He was charged with the accomplishment of an impossibility, the stepping up—in a matter of months—of the productive capacity of the aircraft industry from 35,000 to 50,000, to 75,000 warplanes a year. All the graphs proved conclusively that the factories had not the space, the equipment, or the men to do this.

It was done. It was done largely because this man was not ashamed to call a manufacturer on long-distance telephone and ask if he was flying an American flag over his factory. If he was, he was told that the flag was in trouble. He was urged to go to work for it. Invariably the manufacturer would perform the impossible for love of country.

Are you ashamed and self-conscious when the flag is mentioned or waved? Does it embarrass you when it is used as something more than background, decoration, and scenic design for political clap-trap? There are many of us who are not embarrassed, many of us who cannot encounter it suddenly flying on foreign soil without a tightening in our throats, many millions of us who, in one or the other World War, took an oath committing us to die for it if necessary. One doesn't go around talking about it; one doesn't even think about it much, but it is there. It always has been, this love of our flag, our land, our Nation and its principles, else we would not have survived as we are today.

We know that you have it, too, that you are like us—people with warmth and emotion. But sometimes when we listen to you in your fury and pride of office, in the narrowness of the viewpoint from which you debate that which will affect not only the lives and welfare of the few from your constituency, but the lives of all of us, in the sordid struggle of living your political life, we feel as though you had forgotten us, Americans and America.

It is spring again. The cherry buds are opening. Open your hearts to the love of your countrymen and your country.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS] is recognized for 1 hour.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the Members of the House what $15 will buy today in the American grocery and meat store. You see here a basket of food. Yesterday, March 12, in Washington, D. C., I paid $15 for these articles and the articles in this box, I could have bought last June for $10, just before the Congress removed price controls—the same amounts and the same quality. The store where these foods were bought is located three blocks from the Capitol; it is not a de luxe store or even a medium-priced store, such as we find in a neighborhood where we $15,000-a-year Congressmen live. It is the lowest-price chain store in the city. I have here the goods themselves and the sales slips showing the prices item by item.

Mr. Speaker, the food-buying power of a $10 bill is very important. In my opinion, it is as important and disturbing and as full of economic and political implications and consequences as any weighty, complicated matter that will come to the floor of this House. What does the terrifying shrinkage in the purchasing power of the consumer's food dollar mean to Congress? It has meant to the American people the cashing of millions of dollars of War Savings bonds, and it has caused the fastest increase in installment buying in our history. If rent control is done to death April 30, as this Congress now proposes, rents will jump as food prices have jumped, and the landlords alone know how much. As a result, Nation-wide, there will be more and more wage demands. There will be strikes. Production will be interrupted. Shortages will be transferred into so-called surpluses, as millions find their pockets picked by the lifting of rent controls. There will be trouble beyond anything which we have had in this country since 1931. The lifting of rent controls on top of the high and rising cost of food is just too much.

This heavy burden is too much for the American housewife to bear, and the American wage earner simply is not going to let her bear it.

I want the Members of this House to stop, look, and listen before it is too late. I say that the direct injury to 50,000,000 American renters by the proposed lifting of rent controls must be immediately repaired, for an effective OPA rent-control program regardless of loud utterances to the contrary will end on April 30 unless we take some legislative action. This House decreed that, when it passed the deficiency appropriation bill on March 5 and the conference report which did exactly the same thing on March 11.

You cannot have rent control unless you can enforce rent control. Without the 649 area rent-control offices there will be no rent control in this country. Nobody cares what you call it, nobody cares who administers it, if you have a program. If you do not like the letters "OPA," call it "GOP"; nobody cares. But, of course, nobody is talking about ending rent control. That is the ironic part of it. Instead, what are they talking about? Raising rents 10 percent in the country when everybody knows you will not have any real rent control after April 30. And right in that fact many an American housewife whose burden is already too heavy to carry thinks she sees the fanciest shell game that has ever been put over on the American people. You certainly have no rent control program when you talk in terms of court enforcement, and that is exactly what is being talked about in Congress—court enforcement. Remember, 50,000,000 American people are involved. If they wake up May 1 with no real rent control but only the promise of court enforcement to be passed by Congress at some indefinite future date what will happen? Well, every Member of Congress knows what will happen. Landlords will raise their rents as of May 1, not the 10 percent that is being talked about around here, but 25, 50, 75, and in some cases, even 100 percent.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield at that point?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. If the gentleman does not mind, I should like to finish my statement. I will do it as quickly as possible. I understand the gentleman's concern as I understood the deep concern of the gentleman from Michigan; but I believe that as I proceed with my presentation the gentlemen will see why there is such deep concern on the opposite side of the aisle.

Mr. KEEFE. It would be perfectly impossible to ask a question pertinent to this point at the end of the lady's speech, which is listed for an hour.

I should like to ask the gentlewoman a simple question in view of the information that the gentlewoman appears to have on this subject, as to the operation of the rent-control law in the event that the appropriation for OPA is denied.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I have listened patiently for days to the opposite side, listened to them discuss rent control, and the propositions which they have made. I should like now to present my case, if the gentleman does not mind.

Mr. KEEFE. Then, the gentlewoman refuses to yield. Is that what I am to understand?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I refuse to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from California declines to yield.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. We have no rent control when you talk in terms of court enforcement. Landlords will raise their rents from one end of the country to the other on May 1 if the rent-control program ends on April 30 as now proposed by Congress. Evictions will follow. Then the American people perhaps will be invited to take their cases to court. What will happen? You know what will happen. Those cases will be heard when? Six months later? A year later? I do not know. Six weeks later? Three months later? Fifty million people are involved. Whenever the cases are heard they will not be heard in time to get those families housed again at a price which they can afford to pay.

What is going to be the result if this Congress determines to let rents rise to what is politely called "their natural level in the open market" when in the urban districts alone the country is at least 12,500,000 units short of needed housing.

What is going to be the result of higher rents and evictions of thousands who just cannot pay higher rents on top of higher food costs?

The result will be economic chaos, plus the realization that the Members and the party who told the voters that the abolition of price control would bring lower price have fallen down on their promises. They have fallen down on their promises because the National Association of Manufacturers is falling down on its promises. Those promises were made in full-page ads last May and June, and again in October, when price control was done to death. Incidentally, those ads were mostly paid for by the taxpayers' money. The money was tax deductible by the corporations that put the funds up for the NAM operation and since money spent for these ads was not taxable the American people paid or will pay for the anti-price-control propaganda. In other words, they paid for their own poison and they are paying for it again in higher prices. I say "poison" because this market basket shows that the enemies of price control either could not or would not deliver on their pledge of lower prices.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include both of these ads in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from California?

There was no objection.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, let us look at these ads. Here is one in the New York Times, Monday, February 18, 1946:

Let's tackle inflation while we can. You don't want your dollars to buy less and less and less. You don't want your savings to melt away; or the value of your life insurance to dwindle! Yet that is what inflation can do to all of us. Therefore, thoughtful people everywhere are concerned with ways to smother it before it gets out of hand. One major cause of inflation is a shortage of goods when people have money to spend for things they want. That cause can be eliminated by the production of goods, fast, and in quantity.

Then they give their answer:

Isn't this the answer? Remove price control on manufactured goods and production will step up fast. This is the way you can get the goods you want at prices you can afford to pay. Please think this over. Then tell your Representatives in Congress what you believe should be done. You owe it to yourself and to your country's welfare.

Signed "The National Association of Manufacturers, for a Better Tomorrow for Everybody."

Then there is this ad that appeared in the New York Times of July 3, 1946:

The future with confidence. The members of the National Association of Manufacturers have no intention of rocking the inflation boat now or any other time. If OPA is permanently discontinued the production of goods will mount rapidly, and through free competition, prices will quickly adjust themselves to levels the consumers are willing to pay. Then as production gets rolling again supply will catch up with demand—prices will be fair and reasonable to all—quality will be improved—black markets will disappear and America will enter the period of prosperity that everyone has been hoping for.

The National Association of Manufacturers. For a better tomorrow for everybody.

Now, I will show you at the end of my talk that the merchants, the National Association of Manufacturers and the businesmen themselves in the country are disturbed and worried about these rising prices. Every present indication is that prices are going higher for the next several months; every indication is that this new wave of price increases, plus run-away rentals, will make it impossible for the American families to live on present wages.

Those members of the Republican Party who in good faith promised lower prices are now left holding the bag. Their predicament will become even more painful when higher rents begin to bite big pieces out of millions of low incomes.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me those Members should reconsider their position, both as citizens and as Members. I say to them, "Do not look now, but a very lively ghost is at your shoulders. It is the high cost of living. A step behind him is his homicidal brother the gaunt figure of deflation, alias recession, alias depression, alias unemployment, alias national economic stagnation, anemia, and disunity."

The polite names for these two ghosts are Boom and Bust.

To the housewives of this country both Boom and Bust mean tragedy. That tragedy is both personal and national, Mr. Speaker.

The enemies of price control and rent control have sowed the wind. Unless they act to continue effective rent controls, priorities and allocations of scarce materials; unless they quickly supply housing for millions of veterans and others now doubled up in flats, huts, trailers, and basements, and for others lacking housing altogether, they are going to reap the whirlwind in 1948.

Mr. Speaker, our economy is bigger than it was in the twenties. Its velocity and momentum are greater. It works faster. The political penalties for failure will come faster.

If I were a blindly partisan person, Mr. Speaker, I would be silent. But I must speak out.

The health, the security, the opportunity, the very life of millions, our security and strength as a Nation, are at stake. Our hope of doing our full share in holding the civilized world together is at stake.

I appeal to every Member to pay heed to the facts about the high and rising cost of living and the shrinking of wages, salaries, and fixed incomes for the people of this country as disclosed by the figures and reports I am about to present.

Let us see what is happening in the shadow of the Capitol dome. Our economic policy is made here in the Halls of Congress, Mr. Speaker, and it comes out there, in the sales slips I hold in my hand.

This chart tells part of the story of the high and rising cost of living. I am going to give you item by item the cost of food I bought yesterday for $15, and I am going to give you the prices that this food was purchased for last June here in Washington, D. C. In most cases these June prices are for the same article, the same brand, in the same store. In a few cases where this information was not available I have used Bureau of Labor Statistics' figures for last June.

In June, 10 pounds of flour, 78 cents; yesterday, 10 pounds of flour, 87 cents.

One pound of butter, same brand, 65 cents in June; yesterday, 82 cents.

Two quarts of milk. Twenty-nine cents was the average price in Washington in June; 25 cents was the price at this store in June, and yesterday I paid 34 cents for the same milk, same brand, 2 quarts.

One dozen eggs in June, 53 cents; yesterday, 69 cents; same brand, same store.

Two pounds of dried prunes, same brand, same store, in June, 32 cents; yesterday, 54 cents.

Three pounds of ground round steak, same store, same quality, in June, $1.35; and yesterday, $2.07, a rise of 72 cents.

Two pounds of pork chops in June, 76 cents—and that is the poor man's meat which the gentleman from Michigan told us about—yesterday cost, $1.46.

One pound of Swift's Premium bacon, not a poor man's meat, but he likes to get a piece once in a while, 42 cents in June, and 79 cents yesterday.

Three pounds of Crisco, which every family has to have or its equivalent, 68 cents in June, and yesterday, $1.27.

One quart of Wesson oil, 58 cents in June; 90 cents yesterday.

Two pounds of Maxwell House coffee, 66 cents in June, and 98 cents yesterday. And, remember, you cannot separate an American from his coffee.

One pound of sausage, 45 cents in June, and 49 cents yesterday.

Two pounds of stew beef, scarcely a luxury item, 70 cents in June, and $1.18 yesterday.

Three cans of string beans, 39 cents in June; and 60 cents yesterday.

Three cans of peas, 45 cents in June, same quality, same store; and 55 cents yesterday.

Two loaves of bread. Twenty-two cents was the average in Washington in June. Yesterday it was 20 cents.

One pound of margarine. This is called the poor man's butter. Margarine, 18 cents, same brand, same store, in June; 43 cents yesterday.

Two pounds of soda crackers, 42 cents in June, 50 cents yesterday.

A pound and a half of soap chips. Soap is not a food item, but you cannot wash without it. You have to wash dishes, you have to wash pots and pans. Soap is one of the things that goes into the kitchen with every food basket. It was 25 cents in June. That was the average price in the city. Yesterday in this store, the cheapest chain store in Washington, it was 34 cents.

So what you could buy in June for $10.08, yesterday you paid $15.02 for.

We have here meat, eggs, dairy products, fats and oils, canned goods, packaged goods, and beverages. Economists generally agree that such foods constitute over 65 percent of the average household food demands.

In June of 1946, $10 would have paid for these sample items which are basic in any household food budget.

By March of 1947, 8 months later, we find that the NAM promise has not worked out. What was that promise? Remember?

"If we would just get rid of price control we could get the goods we wanted at prices we could afford to pay."

Well, gentlemen, it takes $15 to buy exactly the same articles that could have been bought last June for $10—that is the way it has worked out.

In other words, the cost of these basic food items has risen 50 percent since last June when we ended effective price control.

This fantastic price rise illustrated by the foods in this basket is symptomatic of a national trend.

I quote a statement from the BLS in its release to the press of March 6, 1947, regarding wholesale prices for week ending March 1. It states:

Food prices also rose, influenced by the general market conditions with the group index up 3.1 percent during the week to a level 55.2 percent above a year earlier.

This wholesale food rise of 55 percent is reflected in 65 percent of what a housewife buys in her market.

The remaining food she must buy, fresh fruits, vegetables, cereals, and sweets, although slightly more expensive than in June, have not yet been caught in this rapidly increasing spiral.

By very careful management, a housewife can average out her food budget between 30 and 35 percent above what she paid last June, depending of course, on where she buys and in what part of the country she lives.

The American housewife today must have 30 to 35 percent more money in her pocket in order to buy the same products which she bought last June, in order to feed her family. Has she got it? That, gentleman, is the $64 question.

How are people living? The answer is that some of them are not getting the kind of food they should get with these rising costs.

Do you recall, gentlemen, what the over-all food price rise was for the 4 years that preceded last June? It was 15 percent. Fifteen percent in 4 years' time under price control, and 30 to 35 percent rise in 8 months after price controls were removed.

Now I would like to place this basket where it belongs—squarely in the lap of the Republican Party.

These price increases should make it plain why wage increases since VJ-day have been wiped out. On top of that, as shown in the wage table printed in the magazine Business Week, which I inserted in the RECORD, February 27, wages in the fall of 1946 are lower than in mid-1945. The buying power of wages has shrunk since then. It will shrink again if we persist in blowing the lid off rents.

Mr. Speaker, for the convenience of the Members, I ask unanimous consent to include at this point in the RECORD, the wage table printed in the magazine Business Week for February 15, 1947.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from California?

There was no objection.

Data are estimates by Business Week, based on information published by the Department of Labor and the Department of Commerce. Because statistical adjustments of the character applied to the basic data leave results that are only approximations of the true averages, the statistics for weekly income available for spending have been rounded out to the nearest 10 cents and in some cases to the nearest 50 cents. Thus, the figures for mid-1945 and autumn 1946 are of use chiefly as an indication of the general magnitude of the change in real income.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, our $200,000,000,000 economy cannot be kept healthy on a diet of profits alone. We must have consumption to keep up production, and they must be in balance.

What does the Republican Party, what do the leaders of that party now in control of the Congress, what do the tycoons of American business and industry propose to do about this dangerous lack of balance now in our economy, about the fact that 1947 corporation profits are expected to surpass 1946 profits, that reached the all-time high of $11,800,000,000 after taxes? Do they see anything dangerous in a situation in which prices rise, profits rise, and real wages fall?

Their remedy is to double the dose, the course of treatment that has aggravated the disease to date.

They propose a tax cut for the future relief and greater profit of the greedy, not the needy. Some of them, and particularly in this House, propose to put across-the-board tax cuts ahead of everything else, ahead of national defense, of necessary social services, of adequate antitrust enforcement, of wealth-producing investment, particularly in the West. And—shades of McKinley and Andrew Mellon—it has been proposed that tax cuts be put even ahead of debt reduction.

What most independent businessmen want, I am convinced, are stable prices for materials and products, stable markets so that they can make plans and carry them out without going broke.

If we are going to get our postwar domestic affairs in order so that businessmen can make such plans, this Congress must do something about the hard facts of what it costs people to live.

This Congress must recover and keep a healthy balance between prices, wages, and profits during the next few years when our own demand for goods and the world's need for goods are certain to exceed our capacity to produce. To do so will be for Congress to take such action to protect independent business and genuine free enterprise.

I would remind the Members that we undertook to do just this a little more than a year ago when the Congress passed the employment act.

Today, that act is being honored more in the breach than in the observance.

Acting on recommendations, of the Board of Economic Advisers, created by that act, the President has made certain immediate and long-run recommendations for maintaining a healthy equilibrium in our economy.

The joint congressional committee, also created by that act, has treated the President's report as a hot potato. It has juggled it and set it aside to cool, and perhaps to be forgotten. The committee solemnly told the country that it could not express an opinion on the immediate problems mentioned in the President's report because various congressional committees were now dealing with them. It stated that the long-run problems were long run, and, therefore, need not be dealt with quickly. They could wait until the committee would assemble a staff.

Mr. Speaker, allowing for differences in numbers, if General Marshall and General Hershey had assembled the Army with the same speed now being displayed by this joint congressional committee, the war would still be on—assuming we had not been beaten, invaded, and overrun.

Unless that committee does get to work on both the immediate and long-run recommendations of the President, unless it comes up with some practical measures for maintaining economic health, we are going to be beaten, invaded, and overrun by depression, as in 1920 and 1929, and for the same reasons.

Congressional leaders have not had time for this. But they had time to frame bills and cut appropriations kicking the lid off rent controls, reneging on our promises made to veterans in the Veterans' Emergency Housing Act and wrecking what is left of priorities and allocations in CPA. By their standards, the standards of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover era, the Republican leaders have put first things first; namely, profits.

Unfortunately, if this course is continued, the damage will not be confined to the hopes of the Republican Party, already beginning to wither and turn yellow around the edges. The American people will suffer.

Mr. Speaker, you think of such matters when you see housewives shopping for food these days, when you see them matching their $10 bills and their $5 bills and their $1 bills and their silver and pennies against the labels and the price tags in the grocery stores and the butcher shops of this country. That is where the fine campaign promises of last year and next year pay off or fail to pay off.

The reckless decontrol program—for business—and the ferocious control program now being formulated for labor—are wrong and impossible, and businessmen begin to feel this in their bones. They realize it out of their own experience.

I have here a letter dated February 28, 1947, from a small businessman of Los Angeles, Calif. He is a wholesaler, dealing in lighting fixtures and other electrical supplies. I omit his name lest by chance he be embarrassed in some of his business relationships.

He says:

It is imperative to continue steel priorities. If controls are lifted, prices will skyrocket above today's high levels and will harm not only the building industry, but also the country's entire financial stability.

We urge you to vote for continued controls over the steel.

There is a businessman who has had enough of the NAM–GOP pie-in-the-sky propaganda. He would rather hold on to what has brought him through the past 6 years than to go down in the anarchy that would result from washing out priorities and allocations at a time when our supply of steel is still inadequate to meet the competing demands of transpo tation, construction, automobiles, and other industries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include at the end of my remarks seven items which, in my opinion, establish the fact that honest conservatives, believers in genuine free enterprise, are disturbed and alarmed about the high cost of living and the dangerous effects of further price increases upon our economy and industrial peace.

First. The text of an article by Mr. Russell Porter, published in the Business News Section of the New York Times, March 2, 1947, from which I shall read certain passages.

Second. Excerpts from an article in the same paper of the same date by Mr. C. F. Hughes, business news editor of the New York Times.

Third. Excerpts from the February 28 issue of the United States News, of which the noted commentator, David Lawrence, is editor.

Fourth. An article from the New York Times of March 6, 1947, reporting purchasing agents' fear that rising commodity prices may wreck retail efforts at stabilization.

Fifth. An article by the distinguished reporter and commentator, Mr. Thomas L. Stokes, giving a Mississippi country merchant's price list on food for a share cropper's family and showing a 74-percent increase over last year. This article was published in the Washington Daily News, March 8, 1947.

Sixth. A news dispatch from Chicago, dated March 8, 1947, reporting the statesmanlike decision of International Harvester Co. to reduce its prices $20,000,000 a year before April 1 because of a feeling that prices are generally too high.

Seventh. A news story from the New York Post of March 10 on New York food prices.

Before calling particular attention to Mr. Porter's article, Mr. Speaker, it should be explained that he appears to have been assigned for the past year to be a kind of psychiatrist to American industry and business. Week after week he has presented the views, the hopes, and the arguments of American business and industry and its plans for meeting postwar problems and opportunities.

On March 2 Mr. Porter seemed to have had enough. He said—I want to read this, word for word:

In the grand ballroom of the big hotel in Chicago last week various speakers warned a meeting of the American Management Association that the future of the free-enterprise system depended upon business and industry improving their human relations with the public; that is, with their workers and their consumers as human beings. Top management was held to be fumbling the ball in this most important and difficult field.

In the lobbies of the same hotel and in the nearby business offices and streets of Chicago's famous Loop, the nerve center of the great Midwest industrial and agricultural regions which come together there, this reporter found strong support for such a view of the current public relations of the American economic system.

Chicago's newspapers were headlining $30 hogs, highest on record; predicting $1 a pound pork chops in a few days, so that what has been traditionally the poor man's meat has become a luxury product, and reporting March wheat at the highest price since 1920. Prices of clothing were also on the climb.

Businessmen and economists in the middle-income brackets were complaining about being priced out of the market themselves for new homes, automobiles, and other manufactured articles which the economists call durable consumer goods.

And everybody, rich, poor, or in-between, was talking about the huge profits being reported and the fat dividend melons being cut by many of the country's large corporations.

Obviously, here is a problem in public relations which reaches right down to the grass roots of what people as individual human beings, not as statistics in an official report or lines on a chart, have to pay for what they eat, wear, live in, or otherwise use in their daily lives, what they can afford to buy, how long they can remain customers or potential customers, except for the barest necessities, of the products of American industry, and how all this will affect their confidence in the American system as a whole

Mr. Porter then poses his warning, and it is a warning I think that every Member of the House should ponder. I quote:

The time is getting close when industry must find an answer to this problem that will satisfy the public in the next 60 or 90 days. Management will have to deal with postponed wage demands in coal, steel, automobile, telephone, electrical, railroad, and other strategic industries.

Mr. Speaker, by striking at rent control and by proposals to wipe out our housing priorities and allocations, Congress itself has hastened the day of the show-down, Mr. Porter predicts. He warns that the new upsurge of prices and higher rents will affect future wage negotiations. He says—and I quote:

If the new upsurge of commodity prices is not checked, if rent ceilings are raised suddenly and indiscriminately, the effect on coming wage negotiations may be very bad.

Mr. Porter says further, and I quote:

Another big inflationary spurt, pricing more and more buyers out of the market, it is held may eventually result in huge unsaleable surpluses which might have to be dumped on the market at a terrific loss, causing business failures, mass lay-offs and depression. Many businessmen concede privately that prices are too high and should be reduced voluntarily and gradually now in order to stop the inflationary spiral and forestall the deflationary one that might follow a forced and sharp break in prices later. But, with a few exceptions, everybody seems to be waiting for the other fellow's prices to be cut first.

So what should be done?

Members will do well to give thought to Mr. Porter's answer.

So will the officers and the dues-paying members of the NAM.

Here is Mr. Porter's prescription:

National leadership appears to be required, but so far has been lacking either to reduce prices or explain convincingly why this cannot be done. Of course, neither the Government nor a private organization like the National Association of Manufacturers has the power to compel any businessman to reduce prices, but each has a great deal of moral authority, and an appeal from either, coming on the eve of major wage negotiations, would be hard to ignore.

To the NAM, Mr. Porter suggests "action in the public interest." International Harvester's price cuts are a sample of what could be done along this line.

To this House, I suggest "action in the public interest"—and fast. Mr. Porter says we have great moral authority. He suggests we exercise it before it is too late. I say Amen.

Let us get down to our business, which is outlined in the Employment Act of 1946 and spelled out in the President's recommendations thereunder. Mr. Porter suggests we have 60 to 90 days to avert disaster.

If we persist in wrecking rent control April 30, it is later than we think.

Mr. Speaker, the times call for national unity and singleness of purpose in domestic as well as in international affairs. In a very real sense, the world crisis with which our President and committees of the Congress are dealing on a day-to-day emergency basis has its counterpart in the rapidly developing crisis here at home that comes into sharp focus when you see what $15 will buy in the way of food.

If we are to do our part in holding the world together in an effort to achieve freedom for all peoples and, therefore, for ourselves, it is imperative that we face up to attack and lick this problem of the high cost of living before it tears loose in a spiral of run-away inflation and a new outbreak of industrial strife.

Abroad and at home, pits of conflict and chaos appear to open before our feet. If we hesitate, temporize, or attempt to evade the courses of action that economic, political, and social justice dictate, we can lose.

If we act with courage, decision, and speed, in a spirit of national unity which the emergency demands, the pits will close and we can go forward to prosperity at home and peace in the world.

As on March 4, 1933, and at Pearl Harbor, it is equally true today that "we have nothing to fear but fear itself."

Let us draw together and again rise to meet the challenges and the opportunities that confront us. Then in deed as in words, Mr. Speaker, "America the Beautiful" wil be more truly beautiful in the eyes of all our people and in the eyes of all the freedom loving peoples of the world.

This is America's moment. May we prove our democratic faith by our works at home and abroad.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I have any time left I shall be very happy to answer any questions.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I will be delighted to yield to the gentleman and apologize because I felt I had to make my few remarks first.

Mr. KEEFE. May I say that I have listened with great interest to the very fine statement the gentlewoman has made. I would like to ask her, however, just what she specifically recommends out of this general statement that she has made appealing to the Congress and to the public? What does she recommend that this Congress do to alleviate the situation of which she complains?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. As the gentleman can see if he followed my remarks——

Mr. KEEFE. I did follow the gentlewoman's remarks very carefully.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I am trying to sound an alarm before it is too late on the question of rent control. I feel it would be disastrous if rents were allowed to skyrocket as food prices have skyrocketed since we did away with an effective price-control program in June.

Now, the gentleman asks me how would I do it. I do not say it to be facetious; but if you do not like the words OPA, call it anything else you like, but keep a real rent-control program. But, as long as there is a great housing shortage in the country, as long as we have not yet housed our veterans, we ought to keep rent control. That was promised by this Congress last year when you killed OPA. Almost no one came out and said they wanted to kill the rent-control program.

Mr. KEEFE. May I say to the gentlewoman that I am in complete accord with that, but I think that so far as I personally am concerned, and with the thesis of attempting to hold down rents in view of the situation facing the Nation, I think that this Congress has expressed itself and did express itself. What I would like to have the gentlewoman answer is the question that concerns me as an individual Member of Congress what I am going to be able to do and what others are going to be able to do in view of the alarm which the gentlewoman has sounded and generated, and which some of us have also generated and sounded? What are we going to do about it, and how? That is what I would like to know.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. The gentleman is talking about the over-all program? I thought I made myself clear in my speech. I wish you would follow the recommendation of the President of the United States under the Employment Act.

Mr. KEEFE. We are talking about rent control now.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. All right, talk about rent control. You have to keep the 649 area rental offices, and you cannot have rent control through a court enforcement system, and that is what is being proposed.

Mr. KEEFE. That bill is before the President now.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. That is right, and I hope he vetoes it.

Mr. KEEFE. Do I understand the gentlewoman's position is that he should veto that bill, the deficiency bill, which is now up there?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. If vetoing the bill could save the rent-control program, yes, but in the last analysis it has to come back to this Congress, and the gentleman who is talking represents the majority party.

Mr. KEEFE. Do not dignify me with that compliment. I am not.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. All I am saying is that you cannot have a rent-control program unless you can control rents, unless you can enforce them at the grass roots. Everybody knows that. To talk of anything else is to talk sheer nonsense and pretend you are giving something to the American people which you are not giving, and it is up to the majority party in Congress, who are supposed to have the leadership, to lead.

I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the gentlewoman is handling the gentleman so well that I will desist.

Mr. KEEFE. It is very obvious that the distinguished whip, who used to be the majority leader, has been sitting on the hot spot, so to speak, attempting to help the gentlewoman. I think the gentlewoman is perfectly able to take care of herself; I believe that. I am simply asking the gentlewoman a simple question that I am just as much interested in as she is, or the people of Los Angeles. We are interested in this question of rent control.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Then do something about it.

Mr. KEEFE. I am asking the gentlewoman——

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Why did you kill the only instrument that is capable of holding down rent control?

Mr. KEEFE. My dear lady——

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I mean, the gentleman's interest is not going to keep the rent down for 50,000,000 American people.

Mr. KEEFE. That, of course, is a very impassioned statement.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. It is an impassioned statement, and if the gentleman will go with me out to the grocery stores here and talk to anybody, any of the people on the street, and know the concern which they are feeling, he will be impassioned, too. I am impassioned. I am not making this speech for political capital. I am making this speech in the vain hope, perhaps, that the majority party will do something before it is too late, because if these rental offices go out April 30, you cannot reinstate them. You can say, "I am sorry." It is too late. But that will not help.

Mr. KEEFE. May I ask the gentlewoman this question? The gentlewoman has said that the whole program will go out and there is no use fooling the American people.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. The gentleman knows it will go out.

Mr. KEEFE. I am not talking about rent control.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I say, the gentleman knows it will go out. The gentleman voted for it to go out.

Mr. KEEFE. Rent control still remains; does it not?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. What good does that do? What good does it do to have rent control if you cannot have the area rent control offices?

Mr. KEEFE. I am a renter. I live in an apartment.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. The gentleman will find out.

Mr. KEEFE. I will find out. You bet I will find out and that is what the gentlewoman ought to tell the people of America because——

Mrs. DOUGLAS. What good does that do? They do not care whether you find out.

The average wage in America is $47.58. That family already has its budget bursting at the seams to buy meat, potatoes, coffee, eggs, and milk. According to my sampling, the housewife is not able to buy oranges and grapefruit any more.

Mr. KEEFE. I know that.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Because that family does not have enough money left in its budget. They have to get meat, potatoes, eggs, and milk. There is no money for oranges. If there is anybody here from Florida, he knows that is one of the things that is making the Florida people so sick right at the moment. People do not care whether you are uncomfortable or not; they care whether they are uncomfortable; they are worried that the landlord to whom they are paying at this moment $30 or $40 a month is going to come in May 1 and say, "You will pay, Mr. Brown, $80 a month or you will get out." And who is going to prevent it? And then the Republican Party invites him, when they get around to passing the law, to go to the court.

Mr. KEEFE. That is exactly the point.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. The court will have millions of cases before it eventually. Here is this case. What will Mr. Brown and his children do? They do not care whether you are uncomfortable or not. They care whether they are uncomfortable.

Mr. KEEFE. Of course, I have never had a conversation with the gentlewoman before. I see the impossibility of even getting a word in, because she has the floor.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I do not want to be facetious. I do not think this is a facetious matter. It affects 50,000,000 American families. I am trying to talk for the American people.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, let me ask this.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. It is going to be too late when they talk in 1948. They will have been thrown out of their houses by then.

Mr. KEEFE. Again I struggle to get one word in in order to ask my question, and I hope the record will show that.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. They do not care what the record shows here. They will not care about the record when they are thrown out of their houses.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I surrender back the balance of my time. No one can go against that.

PUBLIC-RELATIONS PROBLEM PRESSED UPON MANAGEMENT — NEW RELATIONS WITH WORKERS AND CUSTOMERS SEEN NECESSITATED BY PRICE OUTLOOK

(By Russell Porter)

In the grand ballroom of a big hotel in Chicago last week various speakers warned a meeting of the American Management Association that the future of the free-enterprise system depended upon business and industry improving their human relations with the public—that is, with their workers and their consumers as human beings. Top management was held to be fumbling the ball in this most important and difficult field.

In the lobbies of the same hotel and in the nearby business offices and streets of Chicago's famous Loop, the nerve center of the great Midwest industrial and agricultural regions which come together there, this reporter found strong support for such a view of the current public relations of the American economic system.

Chicago's newspapers were headlining $30 hogs, highest on record; predicting $1-a-pound pork chops in a few days, so that what has been traditionally the poor man's meat has become a luxury product, and reporting March wheat at the highest price since 1920. Prices of clothing were also on the climb. Businessmen and economists in the middle-income brackets were complaining about being priced out of the market themselves for new homes, automobiles, and other manufactured articles which the economists call durable consumer goods.

And everybody, rich, poor, or in-between, was talking about the huge profits being reported and the fat dividend melons being cut by many of the country's large corporations.

Obviously, here is a problem in public relations which reaches right down to the grass roots of what people as individual human beings, not as statistics in an official report or lines on a chart, have to pay for what they eat, wear, live in, or otherwise use in their daily lives, what they can afford to buy, how long they can remain customers or potential customers, except for the barest necessities, of the products of American industry, and how all this will affect their confidence in the American system as a whole.

The time is getting close when industry must find an answer to this problem that will satisfy the public. In the next 60 or 90 days management will have to deal with the postponed wage demands in the coal, steel, automobile, telephone, electrical, railroad, and other strategic industries.

It had been hoped that the cost-of-living decline that began in December would continue and spread sufficiently to limit the extent of second-round wage increases necessary to satisfy the workers and prevent another wave of major strikes in 1947.

Then, it had been expected, uninterrupted mass production and increased productivity due to a more cooperative attitude on the part of rank-and-file labor since election day, an improved flow of materials since the end of price controls, and postwar technological improvements would gradually provide a tremendous flow of goods at reduced production costs.

This, it was believed, might ease the country down to a lower price level without a depression and mass unemployment, and set the stage for a sustained period of prosperity supported by high-level production and employment and a better balanced wage-price-profit relationship from the standpoint of both consumer purchasing power and savings for investment in new production and employment.

But the new upsurge of commodity prices has disturbed these expectations. If it is not checked, and if rent ceilings are raised suddenly and indiscriminately, the effect on the coming cost-of-living wage negotiations may be very bad.

As the February bulletin of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago pointed out before the upsurge, that district's average weekly "real" earnings in manufacturing industries (in terms of buying power) have declined since VJ-day because of the rise in the cost of living, despite last year's first-round wage rate increases. It held that second-round increases of 10 percent, a point at which many businessmen have been hoping they could be held, would restore real wages to VJ-day levels only if prices remained constant, whereas a further advance of 5 percent in the cost of living would require a 15 percent rise in wage rates to reestablish end-of-war real earnings, and so on. By the same token, it was shown, a 5 percent decline in the cost of living would reduce the required wage increase to 5 percent.

ALTERNATIVES AND RESULTS

If the unions by strike or threat of strike force excessive wage increases, or if management grants such increases as a matter of appeasement in the hope of protecting the present rate of profits, so that further price increases nullify the benefits to those workers who receive wage increases, and put a severe squeeze on those nonunion white-collar groups that get no raises, economists warn that the results to the national economy may be disastrous.

Another big inflationary spurt, pricing more and more buyers out of the market, it is held, may eventually result in huge unsalable surpluses, which might have to be dumped on the market at a terrific loss, causing business failures, mass lay-offs and depression.

Many businessmen concede privately that prices are too high and should be reduced voluntarily and gradually now in order to stop the inflationary spiral and forestall the deflationary one that might follow a forced and sharp break in prices later. But, with a few exceptions, everybody seems to be waiting for the other fellow's prices to be cut first.

National leadership appears to be required, but so far has been lacking, either to reduce prices or explain convincingly why this cannot be done. Of course, neither the Government nor a private organization like the National Association of Manufacturers has the power to compel any businessman to reduce prices, but each has a great deal of moral authority, and an appeal from either, coming on the eve of major wage negotiations, would be hard to ignore.

At its annual meeting last December the NAM acknowledged its responsibility for putting forward positive and constructive proposals in the public interest for the solution of national problems affecting the economic and social welfare of the people. Subsequently it sponsored a meeting of public relations executives for business and industry, at which the keynote was expressed that good public relations for American free enterprise rest upon two foundations: 1. Action in the public interest; 2. Full public information.

This is a new policy for the NAM, which has admitted its error in failure to offer anything more than mere opposition to New Deal proposals for changes in the public interest between 1932 and 1946. Many observers are watching the present situation with interest as a test of the new policy.

[Excerpt from the Merchant's Point of View, by C. F. Hughes, business news editor, the New York Times, March 2, 1947]

To all intents and purposes OPA disappeared 6 months ago, so that it would appear that there has been almost enough time to test out the theory that prices would not get out of hand when left to the devices of a free market. Production meantime has been running at record levels and far above prewar rates.

The over-all evidence, however, is that there has been little slowing down in the general advance. Thus the wholesale price-commodity index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics for the week ended February 22 rose again to another postwar peak. The increase for the month was 2.9 percent and for the year 34.4 percent. Farm product prices were 1.7 percent higher for the week and within 0.2 percent of their late November peak. Food prices were 50 percent higher than 12 months ago and manufactured products 35 percent.

What the resurgence of price inflation means, in the opinion of informed observers, is that business is riding for a harder fall than the moderate readjustment and recession period which has been predicted so generally for later in the year. The Civilian Production Administration emphasized this point in a statement issued toward the close of the week.

The over-all evidence is therefore discouraging from the standpoint of believing that business would exercise the price and profit restraint necessary to keep demand in a healthy state.

[From the United States News of February 28, 1947]

NEWSGRAM

Chances are that price rises under way will be the last of this inflation. Any more sharp rises from this level almost surely would choke off much demand.

Living costs are going to rise somewhat further due to new price rises. Meats, for example, are to cost more. Mark-ups still are being made on clothing.

Rents are due to take a sharp rise in the second half of 1947.

A new car won't cost less before late 1947, if then. It is the same with electrical equipment for the house. Housefurnishings aren't declining in price.

Cost of building is getting up to rather fantastic heights. The rise in price of building materials since prewar has been greater than the rise after World War I that stopped the first postwar building boom in its tracks.

Of course, it always is possible that the cycle can take another turn in an upward direction, with a new wave of wage increases followed by a new wave of price increases. That is a rather slim prospect, though, now that production is rolling in a big way. Wage rates will go up some, but if prices rise much more there can be a sudden and severe check to many kinds of demands.

Just to give you an idea of how high prices already have risen:

Farm products, at wholesale, are up 159 percent since 1939.

Foods, among farm products, are up 129 percent in the same period.

All other commodities, as a whole, have risen 58 percent at wholesale.

Building materials cost 91 percent more than before the war. Cost of these materials has risen 23 percent in 13 weeks and still is skyrocketing.

Textile products, at wholesale, are 94 percent higher than in prewar.

A very large price inflation obviously has occurred. Inflation still is under way in many prices. The bigger the inflation, the harder the fall when the break comes, as it always does when things have moved up this much.

A house built at these levels would be built at or near the cycle top.

Old-house values will remain high so long as building costs are high and so long as demand for dwellings is greater than the supply.

Apartment house and other rental-housing construction will continue to be discouraged so long as building costs are high and rents are held low.

Any real slow-down in construction can have important effects upon business in general. With construction prices up where they are, and rising, there is growing doubt whether volume of construction can be maintained through 1947.

Building materials, farm products, textiles are price-danger spots.

CALL RISING PRICES HOLD-LINE THREAT—PURCHASING AGENTS SAY TREND IN MATERIALS MAY WRECK RETAIL EFFORTS FOR STABILIZATION—COMMODITY GAINS CITED—COVER NEW PEAKS IN METALS, HOGS, BEEF, WHEAT—DISCOUNT COPPER DUTY CUT FOR RELIEF

Efforts to "hold the line" and prevent a "second round" of increases of retail prices may be wrecked by current upward spirals in materials prices, industrial purchasing agents disclosed here yesterday. New peaks in prices in copper, silver, pig iron, scrap, lead, hogs, beef, wheat, and other materials and supplies may bring serious repercussions through forcing repricing of manufactured products on a new high level in both the wholesale and retail trade, they said.

The price curve for many products is now beginning to look more like a repetition of the 1920 and 1929 patterns, leading purchasing executives revealed.

Large buyers of copper said that the latest rise of this commodity to 21.5 cents had particularly increased their apprehension about the danger of a further inflationary spiral. They said that the actual monthly deficiency of copper for domestic users is not less than 30,000 tons a month, and probably is closer to 50,000.

FOREIGN RELIEF DISCOUNTED

Prospects for relief through lowering the 4-cent tariff were said to be scanty, since foreign demand for copper has shown no signs of slackening despite reports of unsettled business conditions in England and Europe. Unless sellers of foreign copper have tonnage in reserve, available for sale to American buyers, domestic purchasing agents will have a hard time getting increased copper from foreign sources, they said. So far as is known, there are no large foreign reserve stocks available for purchase, they disclosed.

At 21½ cents, or at 23 or 25 cents, copper is getting into a price area in which an industrial buyer has got to be cautious, purchasing executives warned. The latest increase means that this metal has passed out of one general price area and into another in which, unless buyers stay "close to shore" and buy only for delivery in the next couple of months, they may get into trouble, it was said.

End products of copper, including wire and cable, have gone up in price, buyers disclosed. Several end product manufacturers are not only reflecting the advance in the price of the metal, but are also taking advantage of their position to increase certain products more than the percentage of increase in copper prices would warrant, they said. Weatherproof, magnet wire, and some bare and tin sizes of copper wire have advanced, they said. Because of scarce supplies, some manufacturers have apparently decided to make some money on their available materials, purchasing agents said.

URGE CHECK ON RISES

Raw materials, which have advanced during the past two weeks in fairly large jumps, represent a very substantial segment of the national economy, purchasing agents said. If they were in a position to do so, they said they would insist that somebody has got to stop excessive price rises some way very soon.

One way to meet this problem would be for some of the leading manufacturers to say that they simply cannot make their products at reasonable prices with raw materials spiraling upward from present levels, purchasing executives said. Acting on such a policy, they would cut off buying at present levels and merely sell from current inventories until prices dropped to lower levels, they said.

Some manufacturers in the metropolitan area already have adopted that policy. Lamp manufacturers, it was disclosed yesterday, have stopped buying cast-iron lamp bases in quantities of 1,000 or 2,000 per order, and are now buying hand-to-mouth in quantities of 100 or 200 at a time. These orders have been cut back because of fear of a sudden price decline causing inventory losses, they said.

This is the time to keep calm, cool, and collected, the Bulletin of the National Association of Purchasing Agents released today advises industry. "Some commodity markets have gone completely haywire during the past few weeks * * * these price advances are bad medicine," it said.

DEMOCRACY BEGINS AT HOME

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

Sometimes a case history is a good thing to show us some of the hard facts of life.

Here's one contained in a letter from Mississippi:

"I am a country merchant. My trade is made up wholly of Negro share croppers and other Negro farm workers. I am white and native of Mississippi. Both my grandfathers were slave owners. My father served 4 years in the Confederate Army. So if I am 'red' I am a native southern red.

"I am enclosing a fairly typical grocery list of a share-cropper family and comparative prices as between controlled prices last March 1 and uncontrolled prices this March 1. You will note the percentage increase to these farm families in their food cost is 74.

"It is not expected that anything will be done by the Government or otherwise to correct this gross injustice to the people involved by the removal of price control, because they are in the same position as the peasants of Russia, coolies of China, and peons of Mexico. They have no voice in government and fear to make protest."

He enclosed the following table:

	Controlled Mar. 1, 1946	Uncontrolled Mar. 1, 1947	Increase
50 pounds flour	$2.85	$4.35	$1.50
16 pounds lard	1.61	3.75	2.14
25 pounds meal	1.20	1.50	.30
1 gallon molasses	.90	1.25	.35
8 pounds meat (salt)	1.76	3.20	1.44
1 pound coffee	.35	.50	.15
1 pound baking powder	.25	.25	.00
5 pounds beans	.50	.88	.38
5 pounds peas	.50	1.38	.88
6 cans salmon	1.20	2.34	1.14
5 pounds sugar	.35	.75	.40
5 pounds rice	.50	.75	.25
1 package washing powder	.26	.45	.19
5 bars soap	.50	.75	.25
Total	12.73	22.10	9.37

Typical monthly grocery list of share-cropper family of four to eight members.

Monthly cash furnish—$20 to $30.

* * * * *

The "furnish" is the allowance to the sharecropper which is deducted from his share of the crop in a settlement after the crop is harvested.

That's the story. At these prices, as can be seen, little or nothing is left over after the grocery bill is paid.

Back of all this is a human story, or many human stories, of how a segment of our population lives in these days of inflation, with prices for food at their peak. Prices have not gone down as was forecast during the feverish campaign which finally ended in abolition of price control. The few remnants of OPA, rent control, and rationing of sugar and rice, seem soon slated for extinction. The pinch, although worse for the sharecropper, is felt all along the line in other income groups, too. Demand has been raised in Congress for an investigation.

Price control was abolished as a "mandate" of the election as established national policy.

But this Mississippi story goes beyond inflation, bad as that is, and reveals, once again the denial of economic advantages and political rights to a part of our population. It dramatizes recent set-backs along the southern front, including reinstatement of the "white primary" in Georgia, Talmadgeism there and Bilboism in Mississippi, and an antilabor legislative drive in southern States.

We still have a job ahead of us in improving the democracy that we would like to spread elsewhere.

HARVESTER WILL CUT PRICES BY $20,000,000 A YEAR

CHICAGO, March 8.—The International Harvester Co. announced today it would put into effect before April 1 a series of price cuts that will save customers $20,000,000 a year. The action is being taken, said Fowler McCormick, chairman of the board, because the company feels that all industry has been caught in a vicious circle of progressively rising prices, profits, and wages. He emphasized that neither consumer resistance to present prices nor competitive necessity entered into the price decision, and added:

"We believe strongly that the best way to distribute the gains of rising productivity is through lowering prices. We are cutting now, although there is every promise that we can sell everything we can make this year and next at present prices."

The price cut is the first made in the industry since before the war. Farm implement prices rose 25 percent in the war period.

Two increases of about 20 percent each were made last year and a 5-percent increase was made in 1941. The over-all increase is considerably less than the 62½ percent rise reported by the Government in the prices of all manufactured goods in the war period.

The $20,000,000 price reductions will be spread over the four major product divisions, which are farm machines, tractors, motor trucks, and industrial power equipment.

Exempted from the cut are twine and fiber, on which prices were recently advanced, refrigeration equipment, a field recently entered by the company, and pig iron and steel, of which the company is not a major producer and of which it absorbs most of its own output.

New price schedules are now being drawn up and are expected to be made public in a few days.

The Harvester company action is the first important cut by a major manufacturer since the reductions announced by the Ford Motor Co. last January under which nine models were slashed $15 to $50 each.

Mr. McCormick said the considerations that led to Harvester's reductions were similar to those given by Henry Ford III. He emphasized, however, that there was one important difference in that the level of prices in Harvester's field had not risen nearly as much during the war as in the automobile industry.

Mr. McCormick said that the company is taking certain risks in cutting prices at this time. The decision, he said, is predicated on three probabilities: (1) That present wage negotiations with union labor will be settled on reasonable terms; (2) that production will not be interrupted by strikes; and (3) that Harvester will be able to continue to buy its material at present or lower prices.

After announcing the company's action and explaining the purposes behind it, Mr. McCormick told reporters that he believed that industry generally is confronted with a very difficult situation.

"The industry has been reluctant to cut prices despite the generally high level of profits because of the constant uncertainty over future wage rates and impossibility of predicting the course of profits if and when production falls off," he said and added:

"I think that we are compelled to seek a more flexible system of distributing the benefits of productivity. We are operating with enormous economic units—corporations on the one hand and unions on the other. Local and regional unions will not make a wage settlement until they know what national wage pattern will be determined by bargaining on a national basis in Washington or Pittsburgh.

"Each employer must wait until the national formula is fixed. He feels that he cannot risk cutting his own prices beforehand because he knows from experience that it is very difficult to raise prices once they have been cut. As a result we have lost the flexibility that we once enjoyed."

Mr. McCormick said that if industry is intelligent it will seek to work out a formula in which it again can distribute the benefits of high production and overcome the present rigidity in the economic system.

FOOD PRICES UP 50 PERCENT WITHOUT OPA—NAM'S PROMISE TO PUBLIC BROKEN

(By Henry Moscow)

"If OPA is permanently discontinued the production of goods will mount rapidly and through free competition prices will quickly adjust themselves to levels that consumers are willing to pay. * * * As production gets rolling again, supply will catch up with demand, prices will be fair and reasonable to all, quality will be improved * * * and America will enter the period of prosperity that everyone has been hoping for." National Association of Manufacturers, in a full page advertisement, July 3, 1946.

How has this prediction been substantiated?

The price of food has risen more than 50 percent since full OPA controls were removed June 30, 1946.

In dollars and cents—as translated by the Dun & Bradstreet wholesale price index—food that cost $4.20, the day that OPA began to die piecemeal, cost $4.52 2 days later, cost an all-time high of $6.50 last February 20 and cost an even higher all-time high of $6.77 on March 4.

There is no indication of an immediate decline or even of a leveling off.

Pork prices, for instance, already setting records, are expected to rise even further, increasing the demand—and the price—for beef.

"It's a consumer-producer victory over bureaucratic control. It must be expected that there will be erratic and fluctuating markets with higher prices but this will pass—probably by midwinter—as supplies increase."— the National Livestock Producers Association on October 14, 1946, after President Truman eliminated OPA meat price controls.

The extent of the consumer-producer victory is clarified by the following table comparing final OPA prices with levels current March 6, the last date for which the Department of Markets has released figures:

	Last OPA price	Mar. 6
Rib roast	$0.48	$0.59
Sirloin	.55	.73
Porterhouse	.64	.75
Pork loin roast	.43	.69
Pork loin chops	.48	.75
Veal loin chops	.48	.75
Veal cutlets	.50	.90

Pork chops have since risen in some markets to 85 cents, with dollar-a-pound pork chops in sight. Veal chops have hit 98 cents, veal cutlets $1, porterhouse and sirloin steaks 85 cents in some shops, the department of markets reports.

The reason for the increase? Large consumer demand colliding with shrinking supplies—a situation foreseen by OPA's defenders and offered by them as evidence of the need to continue controls.

Last fall's pig crop was off 11 percent because producers, uncertain of market trends, sold their breeding stock; now, lured by high prices, producers are selling lighter-than-usual animals and keeping larger-than-usual numbers for breeding.

Sheep and lamb production has been falling for 5 years, with last year's rate 34 percent below 1942's, partly because of decreasing demand for high-priced domestic wool.

"As conditions stand," says H. M. Conway, market analyst for the same National Livestock Producers Association that was so jubilant over the consumer-producer victory, "the supply of beef for the year will be very inadequate for the existing demand. This will tend to be greatly emphasized by the cyclical shortage of pork and lamb."

The National Livestock Producers Association, perhaps, is ready to eat its words of last October. It's a cinch the consumer can't afford to eat the association's meat.

"For many months representatives of the livestock and meat industry have insistently demanded the lifting of controls from their products. They have made the definite promise that the lifting of controls would bring to market the meat which our people want at reasonable prices. The American people will know where the responsibility rests if profiteering on meat raises prices so high that the average American cannot buy it."—President Truman, after decontrolling meat on October 14, 1946.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'KONSKI] is recognized for 30 minutes.

HOW A NOTORIOUS INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST DUPED OUR STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, in passing, and in alluding to the demonstration we have just had, and in reference to the full basket, please get the significance of the word "full," which was dumped on the laps of the Republican Party. I wish to state that you could not even get it half filled last June 30, the days, evidently, to which the lady from California wants to go back to. I notice also in that basket a loaf of bread. Good old bread, the staff of life. My, my, I doubt whether the lady from California wants to go back to June 30 when every housewife had to stand in line 6 hours a day for a loaf of bread and then most of the time not able to get it.

I noticed also in that basket some porterhouse steak. My, how the mouths of America watered at the very mention of the words "porterhouse steak" on June 30 of last year, the days to which the lady from California wants to go back. I do not think there are very many members of her own party who would go back to that.

I remember, June 30 of last year, how popular any man was who had a pair of nylon hosiery in his pocket and how the mobs of very gallant and brave ladies would follow him all over town and stage a riot. Remember those good old OPA days of June 1946? I remember the hosiery lines and the soap lines and the bread lines that we had on June 30 of last year. Has the lady from California so short a memory that she has forgotten so soon?

I do not think that the gentlewoman from California or the minority party wants to go back to those days. If they do, I would challenge any member of her party, and I here now challenge the gentlewoman from California to introduce a bill to bring back the good old OPA days of June 30 of last year and see how far she would get with the people of America. She would not get to first base. The people last November told what they thought of OPA. That basket you notice is full. But on June 30 of last year you could not even get the basket to put the stuff in. So the demonstration that we have just had was very amusing. It was a good stage show, but it was not practical or a common-sense show, because there is not a single person in America outside of the gentlewoman from California, and perhaps a few more, who would go back to June 30, 1946, under Porter's OPA. He and his OPA practically ruined our economy in this country. We had bread lines and meat lines and butter lines and soap lines and lines of every nature. After he practically ruined the economy of our country he was sent to Greece to work on their economy. Now we are told we must send $250,000,000 to bail the Greek people out and save their economy.

Here is the thing to remember about the show we just had. At least, the basket was full. On June 30 of last year you could not even get the basket and if you could get a basket you could not even get it half full and had to stand in line for hours to get it half full. No one wants to go back to that except the gentlewoman from California and Mr. Porter.

I issue a challenge here and now; I defy; I challenge; I implore the gentlewoman from California to introduce a bill to bring back the OPA of June 30, 1946, and see how far she would get with the members of her own party. That is the challenge and that is an answer to the demonstration and show we just witnessed. Last November the members of the gentlewoman from California's own party wished they never heard about June 30 of last year. They do not want to be reminded again.

Let us get back to more serious business, Mr. Speaker. I talked yesterday for a moment, but my time was limited, on the very serious tragedy facing the people of the world, in reference to the very timely statement of the President of the United States yesterday. I admire the President of the United States for making the statement he did regarding the necessity for our interference in the affairs of Greece and Turkey to save them from the onslaught of imperialistic communism. I was ready to go along with the President of the United States of America. I felt that he had given a very timely message. I felt that he said something that our President should have had the courage to say and do 2, 3, and 4 years ago. I was ready to go along with him. I am still ready to go along with him, but I am befuddled. I am just a little farm boy from Wisconsin and I am a little confused, because the message that was delivered to us yesterday by the President of the United States had serious impact the world over. There has not, I do not believe, been in the last 10 years a more important message to the people of the world than that message delivered by the President of the United States of America on yesterday.

I was ready to go along with him because I came to the conclusion that the President had seen the danger ahead and had set the course for our Nation to follow—a unified course in which all the people of America could join to the fullest extent. That was my hope and fervent prayer. That speech was delivered, and the speech was a challenge that threw down the gauntlet, that from now on we are all through appeasing. In reality that is what he said. From now on we are going to stop the onslaught of communism on all freedom-loving people everywhere. We are going to stop it in Greece, we are going to stop it in Turkey, and we are all fed up with communistic tactics. That was the message from the Chief Executive of the United States, and for that purpose he said the Congress should appropriate $400,000,000 to stop the onslaught of communism. I am willing and prepared to appropriate $400,000,000,000 to stop the onslaughts of communism, but I do not want to appropriate $400,000,000 to stop communism in Greece and Turkey only to have some other agencies of our Government and some other representatives of our Government feeding those same Communists that we are supposed to stop in Greece and Turkey.

Yesterday we were asked to appropriate $400,000,000 to stop communism in Greece and Turkey. Yet the Assistant Secretary of State asks the Appropriations Committee of the House to authorize payment of the shipment of $25,000,000 worth of power equipment, communications equipment, railroad supplies, farm equipment, tractors, and so forth, to Russia. Think of it. In that serious note that we had here yesterday our President asked us to appropriate $400,000,000 to stop communism in Greece and in Turkey, and the Assistant Secretary of State going before the House Appropriations Committee asking for an authorization to give $25,000,000 of power equipment, farm equipment, and railroad equipment to Russia. My God. Is there any sense to that kind of a policy? Spending $400,000,000 to stop communism and then our State Department recommending that we ship $25,000,000 more to help communism. You think that is serious? Listen to this one. We are asked to appropriate $400,000,000 to stop communism in Greece and in Turkey and yet while that message was being made the American representative to UNRRA tells General Chiang Kai-shek that he has to divide goods which were sent under UNRRA with the Communists in China, which will give the Communists of China approximately $75,000,000. So, while our President is asking for $400,000,000 to stop communism in Greece and Turkey, our Acting Secretary of State asks that we ship $25,000,000 more to Russia, and the American head of UNRRA said we should give $75,000,000 worth of clothing, food, and supplies to the Communists of China. My God, where are we going to come out? Feeding the Communists with one hand through our representative in UNRRA, and through our State Department, and our Chief Executive coming here and telling us how important it is to stop communism.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'KONSKI. I yield briefly.

Mr. BUFFETT. I do not think the gentleman should be so surprised. Ever since 1933 when this administration recognized communism, when they pardoned Earl Browder in 1940, and in sending Lend-lease after the war was over, and every other move they have made to encourage communism, it would be surprising if they did stop now.

Mr. O'KONSKI. What I want to know is this: Who are we Members of Congress to follow? Are we to follow the President of the United States and appropriate $400,000,000 to stop communism, or are we to follow Acheson, the Assistant Secretary of State, and give Russia $25,000,000 more in goods, or are we to follow Mr. Rooks, of UNNRA, and give the Chinese Communists $75,000,000 more in relief goods? Which one of the three are we supposed to follow? Which one of the three are the American people supposed to follow?

I think—and I say this with no reflection on the courage of our President—I admire him for the statement he made yesterday. As I said before, it is too bad we did not demonstrate such courage in our leadership 2 or 3 or 4 years ago so that perhaps this thing would never have happened.

So I say this with no reflection on our President; but I think that before he came to Congress with his message he should have called in the members of the State Department, the American representatives on UNRRA, and told them that from now on we were walking a one-way street, one way ahead, that we were not going to walk both sides of the street or divide ourselves three different ways. That is the first thing he should have done before he came with his message to Congress. Then we would have known what to do; but as it is now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what to do. Should I vote to send $400,000,000 to stop communism in Greece and Turkey when at the same time UNRRA is aiding the Chinese Communists, when at the same time our State Department recommends that we send $25,000,000 in farm equipment, power equipment, and railroad equipment to Russia? I cannot follow that policy. I, for one, am not going to vote a damned penny of the taxpayers' money to feed communism with one hand while trying to stop it with the other, because it just does not work. We have been walking both sides of the street too long, and walking both sides of the street is going to lead to very disastrous results, and the disaster may be that a year from now when the basket comes around there will not be anything in it at any price if we continue the course we are now pursuing.

But I want to talk to you about something else; I want to talk to you about how a notorious international Communist duped our State Department. It is the life story of Gustavo Duran. You talk about communism. My God, Mr. Speaker! We had as an assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State in the United States of America during the most trying period in our Nation's history one of the most notorious international Communists the world ever knew; a man by the name of Gustavo Duran, who was a leader in the Communist ranks in Spain, who was picked up by Mr. Braden of our State Department. It was secretly arranged so that he could become an American citizen in 6 weeks, and he was given a job as assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Braden, in charge of Latin-American relations. The thing I wanted to talk about, Mr. Speaker, was how this man, drawing $8,000 a year salary from the taxpayers of the United States of America as assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State in Latin-American relations, how that man duped our State Department to where he gave the Communists a foothold in South America right under our very nose.

We do not have to go to Greece and Turkey to fight the danger of communism, we can go right to South America, where, due to the machinations of an employee of our State Department, drawing $8,000 a year, a notorious, imported, international, alien Communist made at the convenience of the State Department a citizen of this country in 6 weeks, dictated the policies of Latin-American relations to the point where we were knifed out and the Communists came in.

I wish I had time to tell you the full import of the story in detail—his record, step by step; his Communist connections; his connections with the international Communist organization of the world, with its headquarters at Havana, Cuba, working through our State Department as his headquarters; how he worked with notorious CIO Communists in this country; how they started out on a campaign of smear against one of our southern neighbors, Argentina, and how that campaign of smear worked out; and how the CIO Communists in this country got together what they called a Blue Book, or a case against Argentina, in which they wanted to smear a friendly neighbor, Argentina. They were ready to distribute that Blue Book to the world, but through the machinations of Gustavo Duran he got the State Department to issue the infamous Blue Book that the CIO Communists of this country picked up and contrived; and as a result of that Blue Book issued in Argentina we have been knifed out and the Communists came in. They knifed us out because Gustavo Duran, as an agent of the Soviet Union and as an employee of our State Department, drawing eight grand a year of the taxpayers' money as an assistant to the Secretary of State, Spruille Braden, steered the policy of Latin-American relations. Mind you, a Communist placed in our State Department, right under our very noses, to steer the course of communism in South America.

As a result, our State Department issued this infamous Blue Book, which the CIO Communists in this country originally got up and were in the process of distributing, when they got our State Department to do it instead. They distributed it in the name of the State Department, without having it honestly edited or even submitting it to the ministers or the proper authorities in this country. They issued the CIO infamous Blue Book in Argentina and immediately after it was issued the Communists changed their story. After they succeeded in their plot they said, "Look at those imperialistic Americans meddling in the affairs of Argentina. Is it not awful?" So today, in South America, the infamous Blue Book issued by our State Department is used as the basis for all Communist propaganda in South America. Every argument, every bit of poison that the communistic press in South America uses against the United States of America is taken from the pages of the infamous Blue Book engineered by an employee of the Department of State, an employee of the Secretary of State.

I hope the President sticks true to his course and I am behind him. I hope that he will get the other members of the Government behind him so that we will follow one road, a clear road, not Mr. Truman going down one road, Mr. Acheson going down another road, Mr. Rooks going down still another road. Let us get one road. Let the American people unite and not only drive communism out of Greece and out of Turkey, but let us drive communism out of Washington. Let us drive communism out of America. Let us drive communism out of South America. Let us make our own borders secure. You cannot fight communism by going to Greece and Turkey and doing it there alone. You have to fight communism throughout the world. You have to fight it most where it has been entrenched, and it has been entrenched in South America through the machinations of an employee of our State Department which I think is a sad reflection and a sad commentary on our Department of State when in the most trying times in our Nation's history they could not find a homegrown American to carry out our affairs and be an adviser on Latin-American relations. They had to go and pick up a notorious Communist in Spain, one of the most notorious Communists that the world has ever known, and make him within a period of 6 weeks' time a citizen of America so that he could become an assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State.

You would think that after the way Gustavo Duran had duped our State Department they would get wised up. Is Gustavo Duran an employee of the State Department now? No. Did they fire him? They kicked him upstairs to where, as a certain employee of the State Department said, he would not be abused. Do you know where Gustavo Duran is today? Gustavo Duran is the American representative on the United Nations Organization Refugee Committee. That is where he is today. That is the committee in which they want to place the fate of all these 800,000 refugees in Europe. What chance have those 800,000 refugees in Europe who went through the most bitter suffering and inhumanity that any people went through, what chance have they got with their fate in the hands of a man like Gustavo Duran and his ilk who represent the United States on the refugee committee of the United Nations Organization? That is the story of Gustavo Duran, the man who duped our State Department.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

FOREIGN RELIEF AND ECONOMIC AID

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'KONSKI] on a most illuminating, eloquent, and excellent address.

Mr. Speaker, in his message to the Congress yesterday the President of the United States said:

> I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures. I believe that we must assist free peoples to work out their own destinies in their own way. I believe that our help should be primarily through economic stability and orderly political processes.

Our Chief Executive also stated that—

> The executive and legislative branches of the Government must work together.

In order to advance the President's policy by the cooperative action of the Congress, I have introduced a concurrent resolution which is designed to reduce the relief and economic needs of countries to which we are likely to bring relief and economic aid.

The sudden and alarming deterioration of affairs in the world at large and in Europe in particular requires, in the interests of the national safety, and in the cause of World Peace, that we review the entire international situation in order to clarify our position and determine the best use we can make of our great but not unlimited power.

If we are to assume the vastly increased responsibilities which this deterioration appears to require of us, we must not only define these responsibilities but decide for what purpose they are being undertaken.

That we, the richest country in the world, have a moral obligation toward suffering peoples is beyond question. Nevertheless, it is also true that while the American people are known to be charitable we also have a huge stake in averting world chaos. The two world wars in which we participated within the last 30 years furnish ample testimony on this point.

Accordingly, the financial burdens assumed and to be assumed by the American people must be regarded also as evidence of our effort to preserve peace by safeguarding the principles of the Atlantic Charter and the Charter of the United Nations.

The relief and economic aid which we bring to these countries is, therefore, indicative not only of our belief in the essential brotherhood of man, but also of our desire to protect and enhance those principles for which we recently fought. In these circumstances it is appropriate that we consider relief aid, economic assistance, and foreign loans as inevitably involved, directly or indirectly, in the international settlements now contemplated by our Government. We should not on the one hand add to the already heavy tax burden of the American people, and on the other hand increase that burden by making concessions to the very forces with which we appear to be in continual disagreement. If we are to shoulder these sudden fresh responsibilities, if we are to recognize by positive peacetime action that the frontiers of peace are as world-wide as the frontiers of war, if we are to assume the role of world leadership in the cause of peace to which our military and industrial predominance entitle us, then we must stand firm on the principles to which we and our allies in the war are pledged. We shall betray these principles if we participate in settlements which result in their surrender. We shall betray the American people if with one hand we call upon them for great sacrifices for these principles while with the other we sacrifice the principles themselves. We shall be doing exactly that if we participate in settlements which increase the relief and economic needs of countries to which we bring relief and economic aid.

The resolution which I have introduced today provides that these projected settlements should not be entered into to the extent that they increase the relief and economic needs of any countries to which we are likely to furnish relief and economic aid.

Mr. Speaker, the crisis of these strenuous times recalls to my mind a statement made by Winston Churchill to the British people shortly after the end of the recent war. He said:

> You must be prepared for further effort of mind and body and further sacrifices to great causes if you are not to fall back into the rut of inertia, the confusion of aim, and the craven fear of being great.

We can well recall these words of exhortation today. This is indeed the time for greatness.

We are living in a period of continuing conflict in which the question of survival is as urgent as it was during the war recently concluded.

More than half a century ago Henry Adams, commenting on the failure of the Embargo Act to keep America from the contamination of war, said:

> America began slowly to struggle, under the consciousness of pain, toward a conviction that she must bear the common burdens of humanity and fight with the weapons of other races in the same bloody arena; that she could not much longer delude herself with hopes of evading laws of nature and instincts of life; and that her new statesmanship which made peace a passion could lead to no better result than had been reached by the barbarous system which made war a duty.

The Embargo Act was passed 140 years ago. I need hardly point out the timeliness of this statement.

It is a truism to say that we are living in a moral crisis. It is a fact that we do not seem to realize it. We have a tendency to depend more on procedural machinery than on positive action to arrive at vital solutions.

If we can decide to view our present dilemma in this light, the true nature of the challenge will be clear. We shall then become aware of the relentless fact that in spite of spectacular developments in lethal weapons, these weapons will still be set in motion by man-made impulses; we shall be impressed with the necessity for self-control rather than the control of armaments; we shall cease to be stampeded into trivial judgments and hysterical outbursts by the more recent discoveries of modern science; we shall come to the realization that even the atom bomb will move to the measure of men's thoughts.

The challenge, then, is the age-old challenge with which man has been confronted throughout all recorded history. The challenge of freedom and slavery. It is underlined, accentuated, and given a terrible urgency by the tremendous engines of destruction which we have fashioned. It is augmented and given international scope by virtue of modern scientific achievements. It is wonderfully true that a world contracted by science must be united by freedom if peace is to be preserved.

In the larger sense the realization of our dilemma should make us take heart. If we ask ourselves the right questions we can eventually hope for some steady answers. When man can identify the challenge, he can take measures to meet it.

Now, of course, the challenge is not merely external. It is right here with us in our own country. Just as Hitler was thought by some to be a sort of antichrist, a symbol of our own sins, so it is quite possible that the Soviet brand of communism is in some part evidence of our own shortcomings. However that may be there is no question that a vigorous and united demonstration in this country that we believe in the private-property system as a basis for human rights, and that we appreciate our individual responsibilities more than these rights, will do much to reduce the danger of war. Such a demonstration could spread its beneficent contagion to the remote corners of the earth where the forces of despotism, darkness, and reaction are still rampant. To achieve this, however, we must supplement the negative opposition to communism with a positive extension of freedom. We must provide a constructive alternative to communism. But in the meantime—while mortal man attempts by sudden deeds of excellence to match the spectacular mechanical improvements of our age—we are faced with an immediate challenge beyond our borders which requires vision, courage, and the wisdom of Solomon.

We have seen in the course of the last 30 years that the world's wars are a matter for our deep concern. Our generation has lived in an almost continuous state of emergency in which the alarms outside our frontiers have had a tremendous impact upon the lives of our people. We have tried to learn our lesson. In the brief months which have elapsed since the termination of World War II, we have talked of one world as glibly, as enthusiastically, as we once spoke of the Monroe Doctrine. We have talked of it—yes—but I fear that we express our newly found internationalism rather in terms of financial and economic aid than by way of real involvement in the affairs of other nations. We are now face to face with destiny.

Unless our interest in the affairs of other nations is of a purely charitable nature, it is time that we realized a few basic facts and thereby bring our understanding of our predicament in line with the preternatural power of the atom bomb.

First. Let us recognize once and for all that there is no sharp dividing line between war and peace. Wars are but extensions of peacetime conflict—the final confession of man's inability to solve his differences by peaceful means. Accordingly, if we were justified in participating in the world's wars, we are at least as justified in participating in the world's peacetime conflicts.

Second. We must abandon the idea that we can oppose the disruptive forces now at large in the world without interfering in the internal affairs of other countries. We must interfere. We must interfere in order to bring relief and economic aid to those who need it rather than to those who do not and who use it to destroy the very principles which are still widely cherished. We must interfere in order that these nations shall not be a constant drain on our resources. We must interfere in order that we may rehabilitate rather than pauperize these destitute human beings. We must interfere in order to protect the American people from the use of their money in the cause of communism. More than $2,000,000,000 in relief and economic aid have been extended since the war's end and largely through UNRRA. This money did much to strengthen the anti-freedom forces. It helped the very forces to which we are opposed. It assisted Communist and terrorist minorities to impose their will on freedom-loving majorities.

I am relieved that the administration has at last seen the error of its ways. I am happy that it has abandoned a policy of appeasement.

There is no question that the betrayal of Poland at Yalta, the help we have furnished to Tito, the hands-off policy in China, the uncontrolled expenditures of millions of the American taxpayers' dollars as well as many other incidents in the administration's confused approach to postwar problems have contributed to our present predicament. Had the administration been more decisive and clear-headed we might not now be confronted with this grave crisis. Let us hope that the discords and confusions of the past can provide the harmonies of the future. Let us face the actualities as they are presented to us by our President. We must do more than use the power of money.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, we have been asked to "authorize the detail of American civilian and military personnel to Greece and Turkey, at the request of those countries and for the purpose of supervising the use of such financial and material assistance as may be furnished." This means involvement. In order to bring this about, in order to shoulder these responsibilities, we must do more than simply export American dollars to relieve human distress. True charity means more than the writing of a check. True participation means more than financial and economic aid. Yet even the suggestion of money has inspired the remark that this would be followed by "demands that millions of our men be sent again to fight on foreign soil." May I suggest that if we are to do any fighting, it is infinitely preferable that we do it on foreign soil? Let us be clear-eyed about this and not delude ourselves as to the issue. You may be sure that the peoples outside our borders are not deluded. They are hard up against the issue in their daily lives. We cannot afford to be Victorian in our attitude toward war. We shall indulge such bogus refinements at our peril. We shall also betray the men and women who gave their lives in order that we might have more time to meet these portentous issues. Now that does not mean that we should be warmongers. In a nation of our demonstrated power, in a people of our mighty achievements, a show of truculence would be as unfitting as it is unnecessary. It does mean, however, that we should stop apologizing for our share in the recent war. It does mean that we must renounce the hope that we can prevent World War III by methods which failed to prevent World War II. It does mean that we should place our faith in the force of principle rather than in the power of appeasement. It does mean that we must bolster these principles not only by our industrial and military might but by a dynamic concept of our own convictions.

It is my profound belief that a peaceful accommodation can more easily be predicated on American strength than on American weakness. We can perhaps indulge the hope that self-assurance and firmness now will reveal the essential debility of communism. To quote from Abraham Lincoln:

> In our intercourse with other nations it behooves us to be at once compromising and stern. If international understanding can be perpetuated by giving a little more and taking a little less, why then let us give a little more and take a little less. But never must we do all the giving. Rather in the case of a long and threatening misunderstanding let us prepare for the worst and work for the best.

We can work for the best through the good offices of the United Nations and we can best prepare for the worst by an abiding sense that until the United Nations has gathered vital momentum the choice for the world lies between a Pax Sovietica and a Pax Americana. This is the issue. This is the salient fact. This is the essential challenge of the hour.

We came near national suicide in 1940. Are we now ready to consign the rest of the world and ourselves along with it to the ash heap of a totalitarian subjugation which differs but little from that which recently engulfed millions of men? "There is a tide in the affairs of men which taken at the flood leads on to fortune." Make no mistake about it. This is it. This is the tide. It is at the flood. The rest is up to us.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

LEADERSHIP IN THE MIDDLE EAST

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, we have all been disturbed by the Greek situation, and especially disturbed by the way these crises are suddenly brought before our people with the announcement that in about 24 hours we must put up $400,000,000 as a starter to save the Mediterranean from becoming a Communist lake and save the British lines of communication to Asia.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with my very distinguished colleague from Connecticut that we must be realistic, and I am very realistic about this whole thing. The President's speech here yesterday did not reassure me, because it did not say enough. We talk about democracy being saved in Greece and Turkey. What has happened and what have we done to save democracy in Poland, in Latvia, in Estonia, in Yugoslavia, in Czechoslovakia, in Bulgaria, and in Rumania? We are coming in a little bit late to save democracy.

What I think the President should have told us, and what I believe he meant is that it is high time now to assume Britain's role in the world, to take on the imperial purple, to keep order, and to go out and do it ourselves. Let us tell our people just that, and if they want to do it let us go and do it. We can go to Greece and establish the same sort of military government that General MacArthur has so ably established in Japan. We can keep order, feed the population, stand watchdog in the Mediterranean. Then we shall probably have to proceed and do the same thing in Palestine, India, and every other place where Britain can no longer maintain order.

Mr. Speaker, if England wants us to do her job and our people want it, let us go the whole hog. Do not spend our money for Britain to police the world; spend it for the United States of America to police the world.

I do not notice that England is calling on the dominions to finance this noble effort. Canada is planning to cut her defenses 52 percent for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948. That will be interesting to those people who think that the United States Navy needs 80,000 finger bowls to repel attack. Australia, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa are not asked to save the world from communism. But we are; and our answer should be that we are going to put up or shut up, and that if we are to keep the world, and especially Europe, from going Communist, we are going to do it our way; we are going to spend our own money and send our own men under our own leaders. Otherwise, if communism is what Europe wants and she will not accept us on our own terms, we will get on the best we can with a Communist Europe, making it very clear that while we respect the opinions of others we are going to insist that they, in turn, shall respect ours. We will not tolerate outside interference in our affairs or in the affairs of this hemisphere; and let us remember always that nothing is more barren and profitless than to bolster up weak puppet governments. In the end the strong will always prevail.

Let us be strong.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GWINN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the Appendix of the RECORD two speeches, one entitled "The Closed Shop" and the second entitled "Industry-wide Bargaining."

SENATE

FRIDAY, MARCH 14, 1947

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 19, 1947)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of our fathers and our God, in the gloom of this troubled hour, disclose the brightness of Thy presence and revive within us the hope of our faith.

Deliver us from discouragement, and when we feel most helpless, make us turn to Thee for the answers Thou hast for every question. Enable us to see issues clearly, before crisis clouds them, and help us to choose the good course, lest relying upon our own wisdom we have to choose between evils.

Give us the boldness of a faith that has conviction as well as sentiment, and take from us all fear save that of failing to do Thy will.

We ask in the name of Him who died for all men, even Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE LATE GOVERNOR OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the Wisconsin congressional delegation and all the inhabitants of Wisconsin have been saddened by the loss of our great Governor, the Honorable Walter S. Goodland. Seldom has any man so firmly established himself in the hearts and minds of the people of the great Commonwealth of Wisconsin as did Walter S. Goodland, a leader completely and selflessly dedicated to the highest ideals of government.

His life and his career have become a part of the immortal legend of Wisconsin's history. His administration will serve as a landmark for many generations to come. All who knew him will continue to draw on the strength which was so vital a part of his own philosophy.

In thinking of Governor Goodland, I am reminded of the unforgettable tributes to men of his high caliber.

Edmund Burke once said:

Great men are the guideposts and landmarks of the state.

Carlisle said:

No great man lives in vain. The history of the world is but the biography of great men.

And the verses we learned in school by Longfellow perhaps fit this great figure most closely of all:

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

Governor Goodland was born at Sharon, Wis., in 1862. He attended high school at Appleton and then Lawrence College for 1 year. He was admitted to the bar in 1885, and thereafter practiced law for several years, after which he entered the profession of journalism.

From 1911 to 1915 he was mayor of Racine, and from 1900 to 1933 he was publisher and editor of the Racine Times-Call. He served two terms in the State senate and was elected Wisconsin's Lieutenant Governor in 1938, reelected again in 1940 and 1942. He succeeded to the office of Governor in December 1942 upon the death of the Governor-elect, and was reelected in 1944 and 1946. Although of advanced age, he proved the tremendous vigor and vitality and maturity that able men of long experience and stout heart can bring to bear upon problems of state.

Walter S. Goodland has left to the State of Wisconsin a heritage of achievement and outstanding integrity. His was a full life and he lived it gallantly and courageously—winning the respect, the admiration, and the everlasting affection of the people of the Commonwealth whom he had served so well.

He has gone on ahead in the great journey we all must take, but his inspiring example and noble endeavors will be with us always; and we know that Walter Goodland is carrying on in the next link of existence gallantly and courageously as he carried on here.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

"House Joint Memorial 8

"Whereas the Colorado State Soldiers' and Sailors' Home, in providing hospitalization and domiciliary care for disabled Colorado veterans, is relieving the United States Veterans' Administration's hospital load in the State; and

"Whereas the cost of such care has increased greatly in the past few years, now averaging $735 per capita per annum, and this upward trend in cost of operation appears certain to continue for several years; and

"Whereas similar homes are maintained by 27 other States; and

"Whereas under present law, the Federal Government allows only $300 per annum per capita for maintenance of veterans in State or Territorial homes, and grants this aid only from the date eligibility of the veteran is established, rather than from the date of admission: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Thirty-sixth General Assembly of the State of Colorado (the Senate concurring herein), That the Congress and President of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized and urged to enact such legislation as may be necessary to increase Federal payments for care of disabled veterans in homes maintained by the States and Territories from $300 to $500 per annum per capita, and to provide that such aid shall be payable from the date of a veteran's admission if he is determined to be eligible for care in a Veterans' Administration facility; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative from Colorado in the Congress of the United States."

A resolution adopted by the members and delegates of the Minnesota Electric Cooperative, St. Paul, Minn., favoring an amendment to the so-called Wagner act so as to permit free speech on the part of both the employer and employee with respect to wages and working conditions and to all employer and employee relationships; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. GREEN (for himself and Mr. MCGRATH):

A joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Senate Joint Resolution 84

"Joint resolution requesting the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States to give serious consideration to the adoption of a program providing a temporary extension of the present rubber controls, followed by a long-term American rubber policy advantageous to both our national and economic welfare

"Whereas subsequent to Pearl Harbor Day, December 7, 1941, came December 11, which brought to the United States a rubber famine, necessitating a strict rationing of rubber products, with the available handful of tires covered by priorities for essential needs. Then, on February 15, 1942, Singapore fell. The Japanese were in control of the Malayan rubber-growing areas, and by the end of March 1942 they also held the Netherlands East Indies. The rubber famine was really settling down upon us. Ninety percent of the areas on the other side of the world upon which this country depended for its rubber were in the hands of the enemy. The other 10 percent of the then-existing rubber sources—most of them also very far away—could not begin to supply our needs, even if we were not at war. It takes 7 years to grow a producing rubber tree; and

"Whereas in World War I this country used less than 12,000 tons of rubber for military needs, while in World War II we used rubber for war needs at the rate of nearly 400,000 tons a year, as a result gasoline rationing (35-miles-per-hour speed limit), car pooling, and the rubber round-up, all designed to stretch the Nation's rolling stock pile of rubber to its utmost; and

"Whereas most of the recollections of those desperate days soon started to grow dimmer by the week, for about the middle of 1943 a substance known as GR–S, an American-made rubber, produced chemically, was rolling in substantial quantities from the first of America's large synthetic plants. Before the war ended those plants had reached an annual production rate of more than a milion tons; and

"Whereas great progress has been made in reducing the cost of this American-made rubber, and in improving its quality and the performance of products made from it, aside from our military needs, we have Mr. Motorist, who is concerned with both performance and cost of the finished products. The manufacturer likewise for progress must produce the highest possible quality at the lowest possible cost. That is the basic fact of the American way of industrial life; and

"Whereas since the important point for Americans to realize is that Congress should quickly enact legislation to protect what has been termed our national rubber-insurance policy so that in future years we shall not once more be a have-not nation with respect to rubber: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Rhode Island Legislature, respectfully request our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States to give serious consideration to the adoption of a program providing a temporary extension of the present rubber controls, followed by a long-term American rubber policy advantageous to both our national and economic welfare; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States."

SENATOR FROM MISSISSIPPI

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for printing in the RECORD and appropriate disposition Concurrent Resolution No. 3, adopted by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, insisting on its right as a sovereign State to have THEODORE G. BILBO, duly elected a Senator by the people of Mississippi, take his seat in the Senate of the United States.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was received, ordered to lie on the table, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 3

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Senate of the United States to seat Senator THEODORE G. BILBO, the duly and legally elected Senator from the State of Mississippi, and thereby recognize the right of the State of Mississippi to be represented by Senators of its own choice

Whereas at the general election held in November 1946 the sovereign State of Mississippi, by its qualified electors, duly, legally, and constitutionally elected Senator THEODORE G. BILBO to represent it in the United States Senate; and

Whereas the United States Senate has wholly failed, neglected, and refused to recognize the right of the people of the State of Mississippi to elect their own representatives in the Congress of the United States by failing to seat Senator THEODORE G. BILBO: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Senate of the United States be, and it is hereby, requested to recognize the right of the State of Mississippi to choose its own representatives in Congress by immediately seating Senator THEODORE G. BILBO; be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the Senate of the United States, and that a copy be furnished to Senator Theodore G. Bilbo, Senator James O. Eastland, and Gov. F. L. Wright.

Adopted by the senate, March 5, 1947.

Adopted by the house of representatives, March 6, 1947.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, identical with the foregoing, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PROTEST AGAINST RATIFICATION OF TREATY OF PEACE WITH ITALY

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Grand Council of Rhode Island, Order Sons of Italy in America, signed by Luigi Scala, grand venerable in Rhode Island, protesting against the ratification of the present treaty of peace with Italy.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Grand Council of Rhode Island, Order Sons of Italy in America, voicing the sentiment of its membership in this State, has adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the treaties of peace recently signed in Paris and which are about to be submitted to our Senate in Washington for ratification, will profoundly affect the interest of the United States in Europe and in the world for years to come;

"Whereas these treaties cannot be separated from the indivisible postwar pattern, of which they are a fragment, and which shall be completed when the treaties for Germany and Japan will have been agreed upon;

"Whereas the treaty with Italy is the most important of the Paris treaties, because of Italy's position, and we of Italian descent are naturally deeply concerned with its repercussion on the United States, on Italy, and on world's affairs;

"Whereas this treaty has not taken in sufficient consideration the contribution of the Italian people, the first to fight for liberation; and then to loyally and fully cooperate with our armed forces against the common enemy;

"Whereas during the war the late President Roosevelt and other officials of our Government charged the responsibility of the war to the then Government of Italy and not to its people whose assistance we invoked and we begot even by its heroic underground; and the new republic in Italy cannot be made entirely liable for the guilt of the Fascist regime, the same as the revolution in Russia of 1917 was not burdened with the responsibility of Czarist Russia;

"Whereas this is a punitive treaty which disregards Italy's active cobelligerency and imposes upon Italy territorial mutilations, demilitarization of her borders which will result into an unbearable military servitude of that country to its neighbors, and other military and economic clauses, all violating the Atlantic Charter, which should have remained as the steady and undeviating anchor of our foreign policy, as the only one consonant with our world leadership;

"Whereas over and above today's contingency and short-living expediency, peace and security will be enduring only if they accord with principles of justice, of which we, as a Nation, have made ourselves, and justly so, the herald in a humanity struggling against totalitarianism; in a world in which we should safely look to a reborn Italy as our most invulnerable bastion of western civilization; Be it

"Resolved, That we strongly urge the United States Senators from Rhode Island, the Honorables THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN and J. HOWARD MCGRATH to vote against the ratification of the present treaty with Italy in order that a new treaty may be negotiated which shall do justice to cobelligerent Italy, and to its newborn democracy."

LUIGI SCALA,
Grand Venerable in Rhode Island, Order Sons of Italy in America.

WORLD PEACE—TELEGRAM FROM CLARENCE POE

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an important telegram I have received from Clarence Poe, one of the most influential farm editors of the South, who is greatly concerned as to the probability of the United States becoming involved in world affairs in such a way as to threaten the peace of the world.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C., March 11, 1947.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building:

Deeply disturbed by the fear that America may be about to take a leap in the dark the end of which may be the ghastliest and most devastating war in all history. I earnestly beg you to ponder our two supremely important questions. First, can there be any justification for our intervention in the internal affairs of any other nation unless a minority seizes power in such a way as to menace world peace, and second, should rectification of such a development come through some one nation arrogating authority to correct it by itself? Should we not rather utilize the combined wisdom and authority of all nations as represented by the one agency properly established for preserving world peace, namely, the United Nations.

CLARENCE POE,
President and Editor, the Progressive Farmer.

ARMY COURT-MARTIAL SYSTEM

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, Boise Post, No. 63, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, have been seriously concerned by the inadequacy of justice in Army courts martial. I share their concern in this matter. Recently I have had the opportunity to look into the details of a few Army court-martial cases, and I have found that the Army court-martial system is completely deficient in safeguarding the right to a fair and impartial trial which we have always believed to be the birthright of every American.

I have received information from reliable sources, including officers who sat as members of courts martial, to the effect that Army punishments are unfairly meted out, that long periods of nonenforcement of regulations are followed by sudden drives against violence, with excessive punishments.

I have also been reliably informed, and I have satisfied myself by consulting the records, that defendants are not adequately represented by counsel. While there are hundreds of thousands of lawyers in the Army, defense attorneys very often seem to be men with no legal training whatever. Judges at trials also seem to be men whose background is utterly devoid of training in American legal traditions.

I know that in time of war, under stress of military necessity, it is often impossible to take the time and the personnel necessary to safeguard the rights of the accused. Certainly now, however, in time of peace, the Army has ample opportunity to organize itself on a basis which will provide full protection for the accused in all courts martial. There is also an opportunity at the present time to review the cases of men who are still serving prison terms which were imposed during the hasty wartime trials.

In effect, this is what is requested by my friends in Boise Post, No. 63, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the resolution which was passed by the members of that post.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We the members of Boise Post, No. 63, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States have adopted and hereby submit the following resolution with a sincere hope that you will use your influence on this subject; and

"Whereas we urge the bringing back to the States immediately and reopening the cases of a large number of GI's who were unjustly convicted and sentenced under the present court-martial system. In many theaters of command, a dual system prevails, with soft rules for officers and unreasonable rules and harsh sentences for the GI; and

"Whereas too often the court-martial boards complied with the wishes of the commanding officers where discipline came first, failing to try the cases on their merits; and

"Whereas a large number of officers and men have testified to these unfair procedures. Irwin J. Askow, a Chicago attorney, formerly a Third Army judge advocate, testified before the bar association the injustice prevailing under the present Army court martial set-up. Secretary of War Patterson's investigating committee recommended a complete overhaul of the Army court-martial system.

"Therefore we ask a clemency board, not dominated by the military, to review at once all GI's that have a good military and civil record. As Secretary of War Patterson stated, he found 9 out of 10 men made good records when given a chance.

"These men should be given a chance to become a part of our Republic, religion, and our civilization."

WARREN A. CLIFFORD, Commander.
NORMAN E. FULLER,
Adjutant.

PROMOTIONS AND COURT-MARTIAL CASES IN THE ARMED SERVICES

Mr. GURNEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce several bills. I may say that they are very long. One, when printed, will look like a large catalog. It is probably the longest bill ever introduced in the Senate. It contains 242 pages of typewriting. This bill and another which I am introducing have been prepared by the Army and the Navy, and are the new promotion system bills. Another long bill prepared by the Army has to do with new procedure to be used in court-martial cases.

S. 906 (by request). A bill to authorize the transfer of office equipment, including desks, chairs, filing cabinets, typewriters, et cetera, from selective service to the National Guard.

RESTRICTIONS ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution. It consists of but one sentence, and I should like to read it:

Resolved, etc., That no further shipments of goods to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics whether by private sale or pursuant to agreements made with that country by the United States, be permitted until that country has fulfilled the commitments made by it under the Yalta and Potsdam agreements.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 87) to prohibit shipment of goods to Russia until that country has fulfilled its obligations under the Yalta and Potsdam agreements, introduced by Mr. FLANDERS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. MCCARRAN (for himself and Mr. MCGRATH) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts, to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PRINTING OF ANALYSIS OF HEARINGS ON GENERAL HOUSING BILL OF 1945

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document, with illustrations, an analysis of the hearings on the so-called Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill, S. 1592, Seventy-ninth Congress, prepared by the Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress, and on the new bill recently introduced in the present Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXEMPTION OF EMPLOYERS FROM LIABILITY FOR PORTAL-TO-PORTAL WAGES IN CERTAIN CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2157) to define and limit the jurisdiction of the courts to regulate actions arising under certain laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment to H. R. 2157, the pending portal-to-portal pay bill. The amendment, which is a substitute for the entire bill as it passed the House, is open to amendment, under the precedents of the Senate, to the same extent and in the same degree as if it were original text. Perfecting amendments may therefore be offered prior to a vote on the committee amendment itself.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wish to make a very brief announcement. We have received many inquiries regarding the legislative program of the Senate. After conferring with the minority leader and after discussing the matter in the Republican conference, the program which we are now proposing to the Senate is that the Senate continue in session today, but not tonight, and hold no session tomorrow, Saturday. Next week there will be a session every day, and probably also on Wednesday night, and sessions will be held every day the following week.

The Senate now has before it as the unfinished business the portal-to-portal pay bill. The plan is to take up for consideration the nomination of Mr. Lilienthal when the portal-to-portal pay bill is disposed of, and not until that measure is disposed of.

Before the 1st of April, however, we are obliged to pass a bill dealing with the continuation of sugar and any other controls which may be affected by the Second War Powers Act. We also must deal with the International Refugee Organization, and I understand the administration is asking for action on the Greek and Turkish loan proposals. So we will have great difficulty in completing that program before the 1st of April. I hope we may have the cooperation of all Senators so that the measures which will come before the Senate may be handled and disposed of as quickly as possible.

I wanted to make it clear that we are not proposing to hold a session tomorrow, Saturday, as had been suggested, because we found that many Senators directly interested in the portal-to-portal pay bill could not be present Saturday. We are not to have a meeting Monday night. We will, however, meet every day next week, and on Wednesday night besides.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who have previous commitments to be away from Washington on Monday. I am one of them. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH] is another. I know of other Senators who must be away from Washington on Monday. I wonder what is contemplated by the Senator's program with respect to Monday? In view of the fact that the Senator from Rhode Island and I are the authors of an amendment which will be offered to the pending bill, we naturally want to be present to submit our amendment and speak upon it. It may be that the Senator from Ohio has considered what will be the program on Monday.

Mr. TAFT. Could the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Rhode Island be present tomorrow?

Mr. McCARRAN. I shall be here tomorrow. I am not so certain about the Senator from Rhode Island. From my observation, however, I anticipate, if I may say so to the Senator from Ohio, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], that during the greater part of today the Senator from Missouri will want to proceed with his explanation of the bill insofar as possible, or in large measure without interruption. I may be in error.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I will say that the Senator from Nevada is correct in his anticipation.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, I should like to answer the question asked by the Senator from Ohio. Relying on the reports which had previously been made in the Senate to the effect that the next order of business would be the Lilienthal nomination, I had made reservations to leave Washington today, this morning as a matter of fact, but I have canceled those reservations and made other reservations for tonight. I may say to the Senator from Ohio that it would be extremely inconvenient to me, and disappointing to the audiences before which I am scheduled to appear, if I had to cancel my reservations for tonight. Therefore, in answer to the question of the Senator from Ohio, I will say that without considerable inconvenience to myself and to others I could not be present in the Senate tomorrow.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I think then we will adhere to the original program. I do not think the Senate could fail to meet on Monday simply because of the fact that some Senators have engagements for that day. I think we will meet on Monday, but not on Monday night; and we will continue to meet on every day next week, and I think Senators may have to consider that the Senate will also meet on Saturday of next week, depending on the progress we make during the week, as well as on Wednesday night.

I do not know how long consideration of the portal-to-portal pay bill will take, but it was made the unfinished business day before yesterday, and it is now the unfinished business of the Senate, and we have no course except to consider it and act upon it as quickly as possible, whenever that may be.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, I, of course, understood that the Senate was going to meet on Monday next. The Senator from Nevada and I cannot be here then, but I thought we might this afternoon arrive at an agreement that the debate could proceed on Monday without any votes being taken. I think such an agreement would be satisfactory both to myself and the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I am sure the Senate will not be able to vote by Monday night on the portal-to-portal pay bill, if that statement means anything to Senators who may inquire whether it will be safe for them to be absent Tuesday.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I wish to propound an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio. The Senator spoke of acts which are about to expire. I am reminded of an act which is of great importance to agriculture generally, which I am advised will expire on the 15th of April; I refer to the act conferring authority on the Commodity Credit Corporation to function. It is necessary that legislation be enacted before that expiration date in order that certain commodities, such as wool in the West, may not suffer a decided loss.

Mr. TAFT. I understand the dead line respecting the Commodity Credit Corporation is 2 weeks later than that of other acts of which I spoke. It is certainly intended that action shall be taken on the measure referred to by the Senator from New Mexico before the 15th of April.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement. I am very happy that the majority are now following the program which has been laid down by the Senator from Ohio. I think it would have been very unfair to force the Senate into a session tomorrow on such short notice, since not only the Senator from Rhode Island, but, I understand, other Senators have made engagements which will take them out of town over the week end. The program, as it has been laid down by the majority, is perfectly agreeable to us. I merely wanted to make that statement. I hope, however, that the Senate will stick to that program so that we may not find ourselves in an area of confusion, as we did on last Wednesday night, and be sidetracked to some other issue when we undertake to follow what the Senator says is going to be the program for next week.

SENATOR VANDENBERG'S STATEMENT ON THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon, after the meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee with representatives of the State Department, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who is chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, was interviewed by the press. A portion of his statement appeared in last night's newspapers and a portion of it in this morning's newspapers. I asked the Senator whether or not that interview was based upon a prepared statement which he himself had in his hand at the time, and he said it was. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has spoken so courageously and so forthrightly in this very important matter and has indicated so very plainly that he believes in upholding the President's policy with reference to helping Greece and Turkey, as proposed by the President in his message to the joint session of the Congress last Wednesday, that the statement should be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I may add in my own behalf, and I say it very humbly, that I think the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has taken the correct stand. I, myself, believe that we must support the President in this policy. It seems to me the question proposed is divided into two parts. First is the matter of general policy, and second is the matter of implementation of that policy.

I believe we should support the President's policy respecting Greece and Turkey as outlined by the President in his message. In my opinion, the matter of working out the details is one that Congress can handle very effectively and in a manner which is best calculated to protect American interests and to help us take our full, fair share of the burden of maintaining peace in the world and at the same time safeguarding our own security. I may add that I believe our own security is very vitally dependent upon peace in the world.

Mr. President, I ask that the statement made by the senior Senator from Michigan may be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR VANDENBERG

The President's message faces facts and so must Congress. The independence of Greece and Turkey must be preserved, not only for their own sakes but also in defense of peace and security for all of us. In such a critical moment the President's hands must be upheld. Any other course could be dangerously misunderstood. But Congress must carefully determine the methods and explore the details in so momentous a departure from our previous policies.

The immediate problem may be treated by itself. But it is vitally important also to frankly weigh it for the future. We are at odds with communism on many fronts. We should evolve a total policy. It must clearly avoid imperialism. It must primarily consult American welfare. It must keep faith with the pledges to the Charter of the United Nations which we all have taken.

We should proceed as far as possible within the United Nations. But that is not practical at the immediate moment because UN has no relief funds; and it has not yet concluded agreements with member nations for military support. We should immediately insist in the Security Council that these latter plans be consummated. We should also seek immediate report from the United Nations Commission investigating alleged external invasions of Greek sovereignty.

The plain truth is that Soviet-American relationships are at the core of this whole problem. Every effort should be made to terminate these controversies. This effort must occur in plain understanding of basic principles which we shall not surrender. I repeat my own belief that it ought to be possible for Moscow and Washington to "live and let live," since neither wants anything like war. Yet we find ourselves in constant disagreement respecting our mutually pledged objectives. There should be frank consultations between us—with all the cards face up on the table—in final search for mutual understanding. Now, if ever, we must say what we mean and mean what we say. Our persistent offer of an anti-Nazi alliance clearly proves our own good faith.

We cannot fail to back up the President at such an hour—even though many critical details remain to be settled in consultation with the Congress.

Meanwhile, we must review our own foreign policy in other directions and make it consistently effective. We must proceed with calm but determined patience to deal with practical realities as they unfold. We must either take or surrender leadership.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I am very glad the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] has inserted in the RECORD the very able and forthright statement to the press which the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] issued the other day following the President's speech on the Grecian crisis. As I said on the floor of the Senate shortly after President Truman delivered his speech to the joint session of Congress, and as I said at a Republican conference earlier today, I now repeat: I think this matter is of such vital importance to the destiny of America that I hope the American people will contemplate in its full implications the statesmanlike statement which the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has issued.

I believe today, after further reflection, just as I believed immediately after the President's notable speech the other day, that we have reached another great crisis in America's history which calls for a united public opinion on the part of 140,000,000 American people.

I want to associate myself with the remarks made by the Senator from Connecticut, and to assure the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that here is another Member of the Senate who intends to stand with him on the sound position he has taken on this issue. We, as a nation, must take a firm stand in support of the objectives of the San Francisco Charter. We cannot afford to permit weakened and starving peoples to be overrun by totalitarianism. We must protect the principle of self-determination of peoples as to the kind of government they shall have. We must make clear to all the world that we shall not be a party to another Munich. There is much loose talk about our proposed policy meaning war. To the contrary, I am convinced it is the surest insurance against war. It makes clear our determination to do our share in preserving the peace and practicing the objectives of the San Francisco Charter.

UNIFICATION OF THE ARMED SERVICES

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, it is not my intention to speak at this hour concerning the pending motion. I propose to speak on the unification of the armed services. I do that because next Tuesday the Committee on Armed Services will commence hearings upon what is termed the "President's bill," which has the name in the Senate of the Gurney bill. I do it also because, out of fairness to the Committee on Military Affairs and the work which it did to carry forward the purposes of the message of the President of the United States, I deem it unwise to leave the record just as it is because the question is still before the Senate of the United States and before the Congress.

At the last session of Congress, the Senate Committee on Military Affairs reported and placed on the calendar a bill which would effectuate the purposes of the President's message, by consolidating the armed services. Minority views were submitted but both the minority views and the majority report accepted the theory of consolidation; so there was no greater difference of opinion in the Military Affairs Committee on the general objectives and the purposes which the President had in mind, than there is between the bill which I reported for the Committee on Military Affairs during the last session and the bill which is now before the Committee on Armed Services.

In order to understand the work which was done it is necessary for me to review briefly the work performed on this great subject, and I shall be glad to do it.

Bills were introduced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], which were before our committee at the time of the receipt of the President's message. Hearings started on these bills in the fall of 1945. At that time the chairman of the committee was on a mission to Paris for the President of the United States. The hearings were conducted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the senior member of the committee, and they continued for several months. After the Christmas holidays, the chairman of the committee appointed a subcommittee of three to attempt to prepare some sort of report and submit it to the general committee. That subcommittee was made up of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from Vermont, Mr. Austin, and myself, as chairman.

I immediately asked the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to detail ranking officers to work with us from day to day on this important proposal. The Secretary of the Navy detailed Vice Admiral Radford, and the Secretary of War detailed Major General Norsted. Day after day and week after week we five men worked upon the bill, and, in the spring, we reported the Common Defense Act of 1946.

After being reported to the Senate the bill, by an arrangement with the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, was referred to that committee for consideration, and extensive hearings were held. Those hearings, along with the hearings of the Committee on Military Affairs are now available to the Senate. They should be used and consulted.

Mr. President, in order that the Committee on Armed Services may have something before it in the form of a bill, I propose today to introduce on behalf of myself and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] a bill entitled "The Common Defense Act of 1947," embodying the last version of the committee bill as reported to the Senate during the last session. The words "common defense" appear in this bill as they appear in the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire, who submitted a minority views report and recommended a different bill. We chose the term "common defense" advisedly.

The new bill of the President carries the name "National Security Act of 1947." I myself cannot understand why anyone should want to turn away from the words of the Constitution of the United States. Our whole committee were united upon the use of these words; primarily out of respect for the Constitution and the constitutional scheme; secondarily, because in the duties which are imposed upon the Army and the Navy today as the result of the great ramifications in international relations, the term "common defense," taken from the Constitution, seems the plainest way to describe what we are doing. Furthermore, the thesis of the President's message in regard to the Greek affair was based upon the theory that that which he was doing was in reality in keeping with the spirit of the Constitution of the United States in granting the power to Congress to provide for the common defense.

Mr. President, this bill is so much like the one which was sent to us, and which is before the committee, and which the Congress will ultimately pass upon, that I think I am safe in saying that in the new bill the old bill and its scheme was followed, almost entirely, in wording even, and in the dividing up of authority.

Mr. President, there has been some discussion in the press about the great rivalry between the armed services in regard to unification bills. Of course we know from what we have heard that there was such rivalry, but, for the most part, real statesmanship was exhibited by both sides. On only one or two occasions did anyone on either side question the sincerity and the desire of the committee to carry on for the benefit of the country and for the benefit of the armed services themselves. One witness happened to say that the bill would do away with the Marine Corps. This, of course, was untrue, and it was shown to be untrue. In pointing out that it was untrue, I could not help but call the attention of the person who made the charge to the fact that the only movement I knew of in our history to do away with the Marine Corps was not led by the Army or those interested in the Army, but by naval officers themselves, who felt that the Marine Corps was a bit out of place on large battleships. That day, of course, has gone.

On one occasion it was suggested by one of the great men of the last war that probably the bill was untimely because of the uncertainty with respect to international relations and international conditions. I pointed out to him that those who were the most interested in the bill were fast retiring from the service. Admiral King had already left the service; General Marshall had left the service; and others were retiring. In the course of a short time we would have different personnel and would lose the benefit of experience in the great war, on which we depended so much to bring the bill to fruition.

For many weeks the Senate has been discussing the question of money, balancing the budget, and reducing taxes, as well as payments on the national debt. I know of no other proposal before Congress which would make those objectives possible to a greater extent or would save more money for the Government, than unification of the armed services. It is not a matter of saving a few hundred dollars, a few thousand dollars, or a few million dollars. It is a matter of saving billions of dollars. This is not my own testimony. I say it on the basis of the testimony of others. If we had had unification in wartime and had been able to do away with duplication, we would have saved literally billions of dollars. This is what the Secretary of War said in reporting to our committee. He was asked the following question:

> Could you give us an educated guess as to the figure we might have saved in this war had we had a unified military establishment?
> Secretary PATTERSON. No; except that it ran into billions of dollars.
>
> Senator JOHNSON. And the cost could not be measured in dollars only, but measured in time also.
>
> Secretary PATTERSON. Time, men, and materials.

Both, materials and men, are important.

Then the Senator from Colorado suggested that probably we could have saved confusion.

> Yes; there is no question of that—

Said the Secretary.

> Senator GURNEY. You say it would have been billions, Mr. Secretary?
> Secretary PATTERSON. I do.

Mr. President, if such savings could be effected, if efficiency could be increased, if better personnel could be obtained, if all the ordinary objectives which each service would lay out for itself could be accomplished, how could the armed services be harmed in any way by unification?

In drafting the bill our subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], former Senator Austin, and myself, after deciding upon the name and the use of the words in the Constitution, settled on certain primary fundamental considerations. First of all, we wanted a complete and absolute separation between the professional and the nonprofessional, with, of course, civilian control at every level. It is important that civilian control be at every level. By "every level" I mean running through the general objectives of the department. I do not mean at the level of the soldier, the level of the united armies, or at the level of any of the professional part of our Army or Navy establishments. It would be wrong to hamper in any way professionalism in the Army and Navy, because it is the result of long training and devotion to duty. There cannot be found in our minds or in the bill itself any single element which would in any way destroy the greatness of the services or impair their ability to carry on their tasks for the Government.

Mr. President, I stated that there should be civilian control at all levels. We were surprised to find that even the professionals in both the Army and Navy were so reconciled to our scheme for civilian control that they asked that it be retained. Officers coming from Annapolis and West Point have been taught such control ever since the beginning of their freshman year, and they carry that concept through life.

There was not a little mind among all the men we consulted. It was heartening indeed to see the attitude of those men, who have served their country well and have been honored by it. They manifested not only a genius so far as military and naval affairs were concerned and wonderful ability in execution of the Government's purposes; but above all they were basically broad, fine statesmen. That is my compliment to the men with whom I was associated during the war as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. The leading admirals and generals have been honored, as General Pershing was honored after the previous war. That honor came to them as the result of a bill introduced by myself.

Mr. President, I feel compelled to say these things because of small criticism which seemed to lend itself to a desire to promote confusion in the services and make it impossible for us to improve them and to carry on.

In honoring these men we honor ourselves; and they in honoring the will of the President of the United States in attempting to bring about unification, are honoring themselves and their country.

Mr. President, I shall not go further into the bill. It was before the Senate last year, but I shall introduce it on behalf of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], and myself, and shall ask that it be referred to the Committee on Armed Services because it is that committee which is considering the other bill.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 888) to promote the common defense by unifying the departments and agencies of the Government relating to the common defense, introduced by Mr. THOMAS of Utah (for himself and Mr. HILL), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I should like to spend a little time in discussing what unification will accomplish. First of all, it will bring about a standardization of matériel; not a standardization to the extent that we would want to place field guns on battleships, as some seem to think would be done, but a standardization by which money, matériel, men, and time can be conserved and confusion can be avoided. We found incident after incident which stood in the way of better progress in the war, because one branch of the service insisted upon a gun of so many millimeters and another insisted upon one of a different number of millimeters, thus requiring two different kinds of ammunition.

Standardization, standard objectives, unity in procurement, unity in control, unity in understanding, will bring about enormous savings and make it possible for our Government to carry on, if it must go to war again, with a saving of men and matériel.

With reference to unification of research, again I wish to compliment the armed services. Both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy realize that the Congress of the United States is considering a scientific foundation bill, and both of them accept the theory regarding the furnishing of scientists to carry on preliminary work. In the bill the professional aspects of research are reserved to the research department. We would not think of taking them away.

Provision is made for uniform procurement, especially at the lower levels. It was almost beyond understanding to learn, for example, that at one time the Navy had all the lumber required, and the Army did not have any. Hoarding of materials went on. Hoarding of men continued. All these things could be overcome by unification of procurement services and proper distribution of the agencies which handle the procurement services.

These things, Mr. President, worry us now that those days are past. They worried us at that time.

Regarding competition for materials, Donald Nelson points out that there was not only competition between services for materials but competition, so far as the armed services were concerned, against the general Government.

Under the new bill, if enacted, that sort of thing will not happen again, because there will be unification of civilian efforts with military efforts in more ways than one. Competition was carried on to such an extent that the War Department actually had to introduce a bill, which passed the House of Representatives, providing for the drafting of nurses from civilian hospitals because the War Department felt that the Army was without sufficient nurses. Hearings on that bill were held on the Senate side, and it was discovered that while the Army needed nurses and was moving into the field of drafting nurses from civilian pursuits and civilian hospitals, the Navy had nurses to spare and was actually not using all of them.

This sort of competition went on from the beginning to the end of the war, and it will go on in peacetime unless something is done about it.

I trust that in the new bill there will be inserted what has evidently been omitted, because it does not appear in the draft of the new bill. I refer to a provision for unification of the procurement services.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR] called attention to the fact that in court-martial cases sometimes neither the Army nor the Navy was able to furnish the proper kind of defense attorneys. Interesting and enlightening reports will be coming to the Congress in connection with court martials, as the result of the bill which was passed after the last war, and which provided for a proper kind of review. When the reports come in we shall learn that great progress has been made in regard to courts martial. But if there had not been a contest for officers in the respective services to carry on pursuit which sometimes were not overly important, there would have been a greater number of qualified persons for each of the services.

I should like to call attention to one subject which seems small but which makes a great deal of difference to the people at home in conducting their affairs. I refer to the matter of reservations on pullman cars when troops are transported from one side of the country to the other. One service allowed two men to a section. The other service insisted upon putting three men in a section. Mr. President, I leave it to you to choose which service you would like to enter if it were necessary to travel across the country several times, as so many of our men did, if in one service a man had a bed to himself and in the other he had to double up with someone.

These are very small matters but they multiply themselves into extremely great things. Imagine the loss of money; imagine the confusion; imagine the bidding of the respective services against each other because of that single ruling made by each of the services against the other. Imagine the feelings of the parents, the people at home. One boy went into the Navy, another into the Army, and each reported back as to how he was cared for when he traveled across the country.

Mr. President, I have been asked to make a short comparison of the two bills as shown in graphs. They will be seen to be very similar. In the graph the President stands at the head as Commander-in-Chief. Under our bill, only in the President is there a mingling of the professional and the civilian. While the President at all times has acted as a civilian and is treated as such in the history of the United States and in this bill, nevertheless, under the Constitution he is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy. As such, direction to civilians passes from the President and command to the armed forces passes from the President. These two lines in the Senate bill are kept separate all the way down, so that at no time will a civilian interfere with the professional and at no time will a professional reach over and usurp the power of a civilian.

Both bills make provision for a Council of Common Defense, and make it possible to coordinate civilian activity with military activity. The Council provided for in each bill is made up of practically the same persons. In both bills the Secretary of State is brought into the scheme, so that there will not be a recurrence of the situation which existed prior to Pearl Harbor when one department or one branch knew what was going on in one way, and another department or branch knew what was going on in another way, but neither branch or department knew exactly what was going on in both ways. The Council of Common Defense will be made up of the Secretary of State, the Secretary for Common Defense, the Secretary for the Army, the Secretary for the Navy, the Secretary for the Air Force, and the Chairman of the National Resources Board, with, of course, their secretaries and their staffs, although not as members of the Council, but as working members of the organization.

The new bill which has been sent from the White House provides for a National Security Board, headed by a Chairman and with members designated by the President, which would be responsible for the balancing of the civilian groups under the proposed plan. The new bill also would create a War Council. The Senate bill provides that the duties of the War Council be carried on under the auspices of the Council of Common Defense.

In the Department of Common Defense, under the Secretary, the Senate bill provides for an Under Secretary of Common Defense who would act for the Secretary when the Secretary was absent or was not functioning, and provision also is made for a research agency which would be coordinated with the National Science Foundation. Provision is also made for an intelligence agency. Those provisions follow the scheme which the President has already inaugurated by Executive order. Moreover, under the Secretary of Common Defense there is to be a Division of Procurement and Supply. There would also be—and it would be the most important division of all, I think—a Division for Education and Training, an education and training agency.

Mr. President, the success of any sort of scheme by which new habits, new coordinations, and new outlooks and ways of working are to be established must have its origin in the education and training of the men who are to carry it through. So the bill provides for the creation of an agency on education and training, to be presided over by an assistant secretary, who at all times shall keep in mind the training necessary for the armed forces, to keep the services coordinated, and striving toward the general objective of bringing about unification in ideas, work, and aspirations. There would also be a Secretary for the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force. That provision is the same in each bill.

Mr. President, I think I have said sufficient to indicate that the scheme of the new bill follows almost identically the theory and scheme of the old bill. So the work which was done by the committee was not done in vain by any means; and now the Senate has before it the results of that work.

In every one of the activities carried on by the Army and the Navy during the last war there was some sort of conflict. On the other hand, in the Quartermaster's Department, for example, I should like to point out certain instances of coordination between the services, the Army and the Navy. One of the outstanding examples of close coordination between the services was in the field of subsistence research. Comparatively speaking, here again that would seem to be a simple thing; but mere coordination brought about a tremendous saving. In order to meet the vast problems inherent in feeding an army of 8,000,000 men the Quartermaster had at Chicago, Ill., a subsistence research laboratory which employed approximately 275 persons. There is certainly a field for research into matters pertaining to the food necessary for the maintenance of an army.

The majority of the employees of the Chicago laboratory were technically trained officers and civilians of long experience in industry; indeed, the civilians were brought into the national defense effort because of their experience. That organization conducted research on its own account and, more important, it was able to draw upon the rich store of knowledge already available in private laboratories and universities, by placing research contracts with outside institutions. The annual cost of operating the Chicago quartermaster's subsistence research laboratory, including the cost of outside research contracts, was approximately $1,800,000 a year. Had the services elected to conduct independent research work in that field, it is reasonable to assume that most, if not all, of this expenditure would have had to be duplicated. But worse than that, Mr. President, we would not have had uniformity in the subsistence of our armed services, and from the beginning to the end of the war we would have had complaints, comparisons, and all the intrigue which the presence of the competitive system invites. When I say "to the end of the war," I should also point out that we must keep in mind that when the men were released from the armed services, when demobilization time came, the Army had one rule and the Navy had another rule. We tried to coordinate them and bring them together, but each in theory had a certain task and a certain habit of thought. The strange thing was that men could be brought into the services by only one method, although of course the Navy relied almost wholly upon the volunteer system, not upon selective service. But in getting the men out of the armed forces, the Army and the Navy had different arrangements. Let me say that writer after writer and person after person has felt that the demobilization of the Army was not done in a very good way. There was a loss of morale which our national defense suffered. Of course, Mr. President, anyone trained in military science is trained for retreat quite as well as for advance. If an officer cannot bring about an orderly retreat, an orderly demobilization, and an orderly undoing as well as an orderly doing, he is not well-trained. I venture to say that the Army and the Navy both did quite as magnificent a job in releasing men from the service as was done by the Selective Service and the Army and the Navy in getting them into the armed forces. That is a compliment to the services, one which was overlooked because we were continuously besieged by letters from parents and from the men themselves who were attempting to point out that things were not being done in the way they should be done. As time goes on we will find that they were splendidly done, and that the men profited by the way in which the details were handled.

Confusion, competition, and duplication in transportation prevail. I have already mentioned sufficient to show the conditions. I shall not take the time of the Senate to mention other instances.

However, Mr. President, I wish to point out a few matters about signalling and communications, and when the Members of the Senate realize what took place, they will be startled, because it is impossible to understand why it was necessary to do what was done.

We get along in the United States with one Postmaster General and one postal system. The postman serves the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the Army and the Navy, and we do not think we have to have a special agent to carry our letters. In fact, there is democracy in the postal service, if I may use that expression. But not so in the Army and the Navy. There must be a postal system for the Army and a postal system for the Navy. Why that is, no one can understand. The addresses were probably the same, and the letters were sent care of the same postmaster, but they went by different planes or went by different boats, and they were delivered in different places. That sort of duplication cannot be justified by any one.

In the matter of long haul telephone lines leased to the Army and Navy in the United States, it is interesting to know that each had a line from Washington to Boston, each had a line to New York, each had a line reaching into Chicago, each had a line to San Francisco. But both of them were able to use the same line extending to St. Louis and to Los Angeles. Of course, the answer may be that probably the demands were so great that all the lines were needed. They had two lines to Dayton, where airplanes were being built, and only one line to Columbus. That sort of duplication could all be overcome, with a saving in men, materials, upkeep, maintenance and at the same time there would be a more orderly administration and less bookkeeping.

There was the Army command administrative network domestic tape relay system, and the United States Navy teletypewriter exchange system. Some of the time both services used the same system, at other times each had its own system running to the same place. Both had two lines running to the Northwest, both had two lines running to San Francisco, both had two lines going by different routes to Los Angeles. But both used the same lines between Washington and many other cities, although there were two lines into Chicago.

Mr. President, that is costly; it is unnecessary, and it makes for inefficiency rather than for efficiency.

Very good and far-reaching radio circuits were paralleled by the Army and the Navy. From Washington to Europe each had its own set-up. Across our country each had its own set-up. Into the Aleutian Islands each had its own, into Hawaii, Saipan, Guam, each had its own. Down around Australia and up to the Philippines later each used its own services.

Mr. President, in addition to these services there was one other which I learned about because I happened to be mentioned on it. Much of the information which soldiers and other interested could not get over our own radio connections, or through our OWI operations, information wanted by particular people, sometimes came over the Japanese radio service.

I was reelected at the same time Mr. Roosevelt was reelected, in 1944, and at the time my daughter was in the Far East. She could not get any information about what had happened to her dad in the election. It was practically impossible, because the services were interested in the election of the President, but not interested in the election of an unknown Senator. But it was not so with such spokesmen as Tokyo Rose. It was learned from the Tokyo radio that I was reelected. My daughter found out from Tokyo that her dad was successful in the election.

Mr. President, I ask that a formal statement in regard to the medicine and hospital plan be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

METICINE AND HOSPITALIZATION

On behalf of the Medical Department of the Army I should like to present certain experiences emerging from this war which bear in my opinion very directly on the problem of integrating the medical services of the Army and the Navy.

To begin with, I would like to remind you that the Medical Department of the Army, and that of the Navy, have two primary missions: to maintain the strength of the armed forces at the highest possible peak of efficiency by reducing health hazards; to provide the best care possible for those who are sick or injured.

The accomplishment of this twofold mission involves, among other things, an effective program of preventive medicine; a well-ordered system of evacuation and hospitalization patients; and an administrative structure which assists rather than impedes the performance of the primary missions.

The keynote to preventive medicine is research—to discover new and better ways of destroying the enemies of man before they can attack him. We have just witnessed, in the research on the atomic bomb, the outstanding example in the history of the world of the value of cooperative investigation. Had these scientists been limited by the confines of their own laboratories and the means of their own research institutions, it would have been decades, perhaps centuries, before the secret of atomic energy was unlocked. Through imaginative leadership and centralized control, the group working as a team found the secret within a few years.

There were a series of medical problems common to the armed forces which should have been tackled the same way, but were not. Although considerable coordination was achieved through the National Research Council, the Army and the Navy never really pooled their resources as regards the attack on malaria, the use of penicillin, experimentation on the influenza vaccine. The outstanding success of this war in preventive medicine was the discovery of DDT, that famous powder which turned disease-ridden islands and slum-infested cities into safe and habitable centers. The Deputy Surgeon General of the Army, who has recently complete a tour of 30,000 miles through the Pacific, reported to me that some islands now resemble health resorts, and the sickness rate is at an all-time low. He went on to add that on many islands where the Army and the Navy both have personnel, there is a division in administration; to the left of the road is Navy domain; to the right, Army. Of course, the bugs which DDT is out to kill have a habit of ignoring these organizational compromises and wander at their will, not our will. Fortunately, by local arrangements, the entire island is sprayed with DDT, not solely the Navy side or the Army side.

To illustrate from nearer home: I am reminded of the problems which we faced in an effort to control venereal disease. In the Seattle area the Navy had its control officers and the Army theirs. Of course, they consulted, but there was no single head, no one plan. Substantially the same was true in the Hampton Roads area in Norfolk, Va. According to reports which I received, there was no discrimination against men in either service acquiring the disease.

The remarkable advances in preventive medicine were reflected in the lowest disease rates in the history of any army in the world. In World War I, every year, 16 out of every thousand soldiers died from disease. In this war the comparable figure is only 1 soldier out of every 2,000.

Despite this record, millions of sick and injured required hospitalization. In total, almost 15,000,000 patients were treated in Army hospitals alone. The fact that so few died attests to the excellent hospital and evacuation system. I, for one, believe that the record could have been still better had the Army and Navy operated a single integrated, rather than two, uncoordinated hospital systems. Early in the war the Navy experimented successfully with the use of Quonset huts for Pacific hospitalization, but because of independent design, procurement, and construction, it was not until the war's end that the Army was able to secure the full benefits of this pioneering.

Although the items procured by the Army and Navy in the medical and surgical fields were largely standard commercial products such as drugs, chemicals, surgical instruments, laboratory supplies, and hospital equipment, each department had its own procurement office. It is worthy of note that both purchasing offices were located in New York City. On the basis of a representative list of 71 major common items more than 25 percent were placed with the same contractors. Recognizing the waste inherent in such independent procurement, an agreement was finally worked out between the Secretaries of the Army and Navy for joint procurement, effective December 15, 1945. It has been estimated that had such joint procurement existed throughout the war there could have been a saving of $62,000,000.

One more word on the supply side. The Army operated 18 medical depots, several adjacent to Navy installations. For instance, the Army had a medical depot in San Francisco; the Navy had one in Oakland. The Army had one at Ogden, Utah; the Navy had one in Clearfield, Utah. Had there been one combined depot at these and other locations, the reserve stocks could have been reduced; personnel could have been saved; and other advantages could have been achieved based upon larger-scale combined operations.

An integrated supply organization would not only have saved funds but would have assisted the hospitals in operating more smoothly and thereby have improved the quality of service which they were able to render.

But the real advantages of medical integration must be sought in a review of the evacuation and hospitalization systems. Of course, the key to these systems is personnel—medical personnel which represents the scarcest human resource in the United States. This country had about 160,000 practicing physicians during the war and of this number, in excess of 60,000 or just under 40 percent were in the armed services. In addition, the services had in excess of 21,000 dentists and 65,000 nurses, not to mention many thousands of adjunct personnel—sanitary engineers, veterinary officers, and large numbers of medical administrative officers.

Despite these large numbers, the Army, for one, was hard-pressed for Medical Corps personnel when the war was fully extended on both fronts. It was particularly hard-pressed as regards those key specialists, the brain surgeon, the orthopedic surgeon, the expert in plastic reconstruction, the mature psychiatrist, who had to assume the leadership in our large hospitals throughout our far-flung bases.

That the best men are always few in number, even in civilian life, can be illustrated by the fact that people came from the far parts of the earth to Dr. Cushing when he was alive if they wanted the best in brain surgery. Today, those who can afford it travel long distances to university centers for highly specialized treatment.

Because of the independence of the medical services of the Army and the Navy, each service erected and operated hospitals in close juxtaposition. To illustrate: On Oahu the Army had six hospitals and the Navy three. On New Caledonia the Army had the predominant hospitalization, but the Navy operated a 2,000-bed hospital. On Espiritu Santo the hospital mission was more or less evenly divided, the Army having three hospitals and the Navy two. These illustrations could be multiplied many times over.

Had there been a single hospital plan, the total number of beds might not have been substantially reduced, but that is not the crux of the problem. I have seen patients receive excellent care where there was no bed available. The key to medical service is getting the right patient to the right doctor at the right time. With only a limited number of "right" doctors, the fact that the Army distributed its small group independent of the Navy, and the Navy in turn took its limited resources and distributed them without regard to the Army was definitely wasteful. Under stress of work, the senior surgeon frequently does not perform an entire operation: Younger men prepare the patient; the specialist does the intricate work, and the assistants sew the patient up. These key specialists could have utilized their scarce skills much more effectively had they been assigned out of one pool in terms of the combined Army and Navy requirements. And what is the true of the surgeon is likewise applicable to the dermatologist, the psychiatrist, in fact, to every other key specialist.

The difficulties flowing from the absence of unified control over medical means was particularly acute during some of the most difficult operations in the Pacific. It was never clear until the last moment and sometimes not even then, the extent to which the Army would have to depend on its own hospital ships or would receive assistance from the Navy. More important, the assignment of personnel to the hospital ships of the Army and the Navy was not centrally controlled with the result that available talent was not always used to the best advantage. This sounds relatively abstract and unimportant, but I can assure you that if you were the patient with a gunshot wound through his stomach, you would want to be operated on by the best possible surgeon, not by the one who happened to be wearing the same uniform.

Talking of hospital ships, one can carry the evacuation story a few steps further back. Through the early campaigns of the central Pacific, much valuable time and effort was lost in trying to deliver Navy patients to Navy hospitals and Army patients to Army hospitals. The following single case which occurred in the Pacific area demonstrates what may happen to an individual patient when different administrative procedures are practiced by the two services in combined operations. An Army officer was seriously wounded on Leyte Island, Philippines. He was evacuated by hospital ship to Naval Base Hospital No. 15 on the Admiralty Islands and 3 days later, on a food ship, to the Army hospital at New Caledonia for subsequent evacuation to the United States. The naval hospital at Admiralty Islands provided care for Navy patients pending their transfers to the United States. However, this officer was transported an additional 2,000 miles to place him in the Army chain of evacuation. With a unified medical service, common channels of evacuation could have prevented this. In this instance the officer's life was jeopardized by the trip to New Caledonia. Results of such conditions cannot be measured in dollars.

As the war progressed, increasing coordination took place, but even at the end, there was more independence than unity between the services. In the United States the contacts were minimal. Although patients were brought back through the same ports—Seattle, San Francisco, New Orleans, Charleston, and New York—they were processed through separate debarkation hospitals. Although one service had a highly efficient centralized medical regulating office in Washington which distributed as many as 57,000 patients in a single month to 65 general hospitals, the other service made no use of this system.

Throughout the war we were constantly besieged by requests of soldiers to be hospitalized as close to their homes as possible. These were reasonable requests for men who had been on their backs for many months and who depended so greatly upon their families and friends for emotional support. We did our best, but we could send a man only to one of the Army's general hospitals which were designated for this type of treatment. If the hospitals of the two services had been part of the same system, many more men would have been treated closer to their homes.

On the monetary side alone it is estimated that integration would have saved in the pay of military and civilian personnel, construction of facilities, and rental of machinery, approximately $201,000,000. If the detailed data of the Navy medical operations had been available for study, the estimated savings would probably have been much greater. But the problem of medical integration should not be appraised solely or even largely in terms of dollars.

I want to reimpress upon you that in my opinion and in the opinion of most competent observers, the American soldier and sailor received the very highest type of medical care possible without a unified operation.

The problems which I have raised with you warrant study if we are to continue the remarkable progress which we have already made. However, in an integrated medical system the high level of medical care already achieved can be provided more efficiently, and improved at less cost, through the utilization of combined resources.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I think it is important to note that there was duplication; there was preference. There were reports that one hospital had to house its patients in tents, while across the way, for example, was another hospital, modern, well built, with floors and all modern conveniences. That simply should not be, and we should see to it that something is done in regard to the unification of the medical branches of the armed services.

Under the Senate bill provision was made for a special study of this aspect of the subject before attempting by law to unite the services. It was also provided that promotions, vacations, and retirement should be made uniform and be worked out by the services themselves before being embodied in the law.

I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD a series of general comments which I collated, some of which have been furnished me and some of which I myself helped to put into form, showing the reasons for unification, and justifying the bill.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL COMMENTS

Procurement deliveries to the armed forces of equipment and supplies during World War II amounted to more than $160,000,000,000. This is an astronomical figure. Perhaps the significance is easier to appreciate if it is stated to amount to more than $4,000 for every family in the United States. For equipment and supplies, the War and Navy Departments have spent approximately twice as much as for any other activity.

Total deliveries during World War II on Army contracts represented an average monthly expenditure [1] of $1,700,000,000. In accomplishing the huge military procurement of the Army Service Forces it was necessary to develop a complete procurement organization, controlled and directed by a headquarters staff in Washington, and spread through all the principal manufacturing areas in the United States. The Navy Department in like manner required a large procurement organization to administer its contracts, representing deliveries at an average rate of $1,200,000,000 [1] per month.

Each of these extensive organizations dealt with industry, the public, and other Government agencies at every level. The necessity for resolving Army-Navy differences arising from the separate systems started with such civilian agencies as the Office of War Mobilization, the War Production Board, the Office of Petroleum Administrator for War, the War Shipping Administration—and extended clear down to the plant of the manufacturer who actually found it necessary to maintain separate staffs to deal with the Army and the Navy.

It is known, for example, that in recruiting civilian personnel for the Army and Navy the situation in some places was at times so acute that serious friction and actual pirating resulted. In a time of national crisis when both skilled and unskilled labor are in short supply, this competition reacts to the detriment of the Nation, not only in the increased cost, but in the delay to both programs caused by the jockeying and friction.

Perhaps there are popular misconceptions about the healthfulness of competition. Competition is advantageous to the buyer in a buyer's market, whereas it is not healthy for a buyer in a seller's market. A wartime market is a seller's market, Uncle Sam is the buyer, and the United States Treasury foots the bills.

The basic matériel, personnel, and facilities needs of the Army and Navy are the same. This is perhaps not immediately apparent when thinking of the three combat arms, yet even the end items that are different require the same type of materials, similar technical skill, and the same type of manufacturing facilities. Both battleships and M26 heavy tanks, for example, require common components and materials—steel products, ball bearings, gears, and motors.

The utilization of existing manufacturing facilities could not be handled by allocation as simply as were raw materials. It was a matter of individual survey, negotiation, and contract, with two independent services pursuing separate programs in an industrial market not adequate to handle both.

Industry often found itself between the Army and the Navy in the competition for production time in an industry, with results detrimental to both. For example, difficulties occurred on accelerated programs in the textile field, such as cotton duck and similar fabrics, where the Army or the Navy in their attempts to cover future contracts optioned the production of the mills. In some instances mills declined to take the contracts of one service pending their investigation to determine the needs of the other service, and procurement was delayed until this information could be secured and the conflict resolved.

In many instances the original service placing an order with a manufacturing plant gradually assumed control of that facility throughout the war, especially in the production of items common to both services. One department assumed complete control of the Taylor Forge and Pipe Works at Chicago throughout the war. The contractor manufactured pipe, welding fittings, and forged steel flanges which were common to both services. The other service at various times attempted to secure a portion of the manufacturing facilities for these items, but because of the influence exercised by the other service was restricted from placing orders with the company.

Considerable competition also existed to obtain the entire manufacturing facilities of the Naylor Pipe Co. This contractor manufactured spiral welded pipe, which was urgently required for the transportation of gasoline and fuel oil at docks and in theaters of operations. Both Departments had great need for this type of equipment, and consequently a great amount of pressure was exerted upon the contractor by both services to satisfy the demands of each.

Both the Army and Navy placed orders and were in competition for the entire manufacturing facilities of most of the large contractors in the Chicago district.

The difficulties of preventing a production overload in an area, either in the expansion of facilities, the overconcentration of effort in existing facilities, or the overloading of transportation, housing, or other utilities were doubled by divided effort. All the agencies involved were faced with the necessity of reconciling the requirements of conflicting programs.

The expansion of industrial plants provides another field in which the cost of separate military programs was evident. Both Departments expanded facilities in the same plants at different times with little, if any, coordination.

One department cut back production in some plants, while the other expanded facilities to increase production of the same type of product at other plants. For example, one department cut back 40-millimeter ammunition production lines at Hayes Manufacturing Co. in Erie, Pa., at the same time the other department expanded Erie Basin Metal Products at Elgin, Ill., in order to institute the production of 40-millimeter ammunition.

One department would expand a plant to produce a product for which the other department already had more than ample facilities. An example of this is ammonium picrate, where one department had two plants in production, with ample capacity not only to meet its own needs, but to have handled the requirements that caused the other department to expand facilities amounting to half a million dollars in another plant.

The elimination of expansions that could have been avoided through the coordinated effort of a single procurement program would have permitted the saving of money, materials, and manpower at a time when critical shortages existed. Needless expansions hampered the production effort in other ways, one of them being the spreading of management so thin that production suffered.

At one time the Army and the Navy requirements for ammunition brass strip were far in excess of the productive capacity of the industry. A solution was reached only after the matter had been arbitrated at great length, and was finally settled by agreement between the Under Secretaries of War and Navy.

The record of the war is replete with examples of cases where resources could have been better utilized and the production of munitions expedited if there had been coordination instead of competition between the services. Instances occurred where plants were dividing production between Army and Navy shells, which required the setting up of different production lines. It is reasonable to believe that had procurement been coordinated and concentrated with one type to a plant, increased production would often have resulted.

In addition, combined procurement would have eliminated such situations as existed when one service purchased towels at a time when the other service had an excess supply.

A single headquarters staff could have developed and published the necessary purchasing policies for both. Significant savings in staff work at lower echelons would have resulted. Only one set of procurement regulations would have been required in lieu of the War Department regulations, comprising a 5,000-page work of 2 volumes in 15,000 copies, and the Navy Department directives, which served a similar purpose.

Another economy which could have been achieved by consolidation is the elimination of duplication in surveys. For example, the Trundle Engineering Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, received $43,705 for an inspection survey and the preliminary work in connection with the preparation of the Army Service Forces Inspection Manual M-608. This survey covered substantially the same field for the Army as the survey of the Material Inspection Service of the Navy Department made by Booz, Fry, Allen & Hamilton, published August 3, 1942.

In dealing with two potential contractors the differences in contract provisions led to discrimination against one or the other service. For example, one service authorized contracts to be placed for longer periods than the other. One service permitted contractors implementing Smaller War Plants directives to pay up to 15 percent more for war goods purchased from a small plant; the other department accepted the principle, but did not specifically prescribe the action contracting offiers could take. One department purhased component parts of end items and furnished them to contractors to perform final assembly, the other service required that the assembler of the end item subcontract similar items. One department permitted contractors to include reserves for contingencies in contract prices but did not permit subsequent upward revision of prices; the other department did not permit inclusion of reserves for contingencies, but, instead, permitted contractors to negotiate price increases resulting from unexpected events beyond their control. One department was willing to exempt certain contracts from renegotiation if it could be determined in advance that a close price had been set; the other department did not generally allow such exemptions. One department required the contractor to send notice of shipment, the other did not. One department provided for upward adjustments of prices if State or local taxes increased, the other had no similar provision.

The Army employed hundreds of lawyers in the drafting, modification, review, approval, and interpretation of procurement contract forms and provisions. The Navy Department also had a staff of lawyers to perform like functions. In addition to the cost to the armed forces through this duplication of effort, contractors offering the same or substantially similar items to both Departments were confronted with endless differences and confusion in the analysis and evaluation of contracts.

[1] Excludes Air.

All of these differences in the practices of the War and Navy Departments were not only costly to the Government and to industry but detrimental to the war effort.

Throughout the war, procurement programs for the two services contained many substantially identical articles evolved through parallel development programs. Manufacture was delayed because of the different requirements for tooling and the differences in matériel specifications. Increased over-all stocks had to be maintained in the field. The supply of spare and replacement parts was complicated. The independent development by the Army and Navy of rockets, bombs, radar sets, heavy- and medium-caliber guns, amphibious vehicles, and submarine mine devices, designed by each service for substantially similar purposes, are but examples of thousands of similar cases.

The need for independent research along similar lines is fully recognized, but there are hundreds of items on which specifications can be standardized for both services after the research and development phase has been completed, and the most desirable type of item decided upon. All too little has been accomplished in this field by reason of the unwillingness of each service to adopt the specifications designed by the other. Both services are open to censure in this respect. For example, 55-gallon drums for the Army were procured separately from Navy drums, from specifications having no essential differences except that the Army required that the inside of the drum be sprayed with preservative oil to prevent rusting, and that a different type of drum closure be used. Despite the necessity for utilizing all production capacity of the country in the production of the drums, contractors were required to set up different dies for installation of the differing closures. These minor differences in specifications still remain unresolved, although in emergency the production of one service has been diverted upon occasion to meet requirements of the other service.

The interchangeability of parts is a matter of great importance in wartime production and supply. If interchangeability is not provided in the original design to the maximum extent practicable, there results a needlessly large demand on production facilities to manufacture spare parts, and there is a slowing up of procurement due to the diversion of facilities to spare part production.

The work of preparing specifications to guide manufacturers in the production of thousands of varied items required by the armed services understandably requires the expenditure of prodigious effort by large numbers of highly skilled individuals. In the main, these efforts were expended by both departments independently. Efforts to standardize through cooperation brought meager results. The vast number of common items gives an idea of the extent of this duplication. However, the original duplication of effort is not all. Each service developed its own drafting room standards. As a result contractors were confronted with several techniques for the presentation of similar basic data. The cost of the duplication continues through the life of every differing specification for a common item, in that on the production lines of plants having both Army and Navy contracts for these almost identical common items, constant changes in tooling and dies, in machine settings, in finishing processes, in marking and packaging, must be made in order to serve purposes that would be unnecessary if there were agreement and single original specifications.

The conflicts and duplications in contractors' plants as a result of the differences in specifications caused the establishment in December 1942 of the Joint Army-Navy Committee on Specifications, to consolidate existing specifications of similar items into joint specifications. However, it was found that this committe was not strong enough, and it was superseded in August 1945 by an Army-Navy Joint Specifications Board, from which disagreements may be appealed to the Army-Navy Joint Specifications Council, charged with over-all supervision of this joint program.

To date, of the thousands of common items procured, only 242 joint Army-Navy specifications have been issued. It should be noted that even this activity covers only specifications already in existence, and does not attempt to correlate efforts on specifications prior to original issue by each Department.

It was tremendously burdensome and costly for a facility manufacturing a like item for each service to be required to fabricate, assemble, and process under different specifications. As an example of how current specification practices work out in industry, two contractors in Kansas City were awarded separate contracts for bolted-steel gasoline-storage tanks by the Army and the Navy. During a 3-year period Army Service Forces contracts totaled $13,323,000. Standard drawings and specifications were not issued to the manufacturer of these tanks by either Department, but the individual contractor's drawings and specifications were modified independently by each service to meet its interpretation of the requirements of the end item. In an effort to maintain the delivery schedules demanded by each Department, it was necessary for the contractors to make frequent changes from one contract to the other. Changing dies, making adjustments in production-line machine tools, and changing color on the paint lines caused confusion and delay, all due to minor differences in drawings and specifications. A single procurement of this item would have avoided all such divided effort. The contractors would be working from one set of drawings and specifications, and the tanks produced would have been interchangeable here and in the theaters of operation.

In some cases differences in specifications were so minor as to be ridiculous. Both Departments procured 10-ton bridge trestles from the Michaels Art Bronze Co., Covington, Ky. Separate drawings were furnished the contractor by the Army and by the Navy. The equipment differed only in the tolerance of drilled holes and their spacing, yet only a limited number of the bridge parts were interchangeable. Not until 1943, after more than a year and a half of production, were standard specifications adopted.

Since many of the items purchased by both services were identical and purchased from the same manufacturers, production expediting personnel from both were constantly crossing paths in visits to the contractor's plants, expediting the same units, and the same components for these units. Instances occurred when expediters from both agencies called on the contractor at the same time personally or by local and long distance phone, in an effort to expedite identical items. This duplication of activities resulted in loss of time on the part of contractor's personnel, and of course did nothing to lighten burdens on the Nation's communications facilities.

The presence of expediting personnel from both services in the same plant resulted in confusion in the minds of the management as to just what should be expedited. For example, a major shipyard had a contract from one service for welded steel towboats, and from the other for seagoing tugs. During the contract period the two services had duplicate expediting and inspection staffs at the shipyard. Both the Army and the Navy constantly strove to expedite their ends in the program and to influence management to shift labor to meet their own priorities. This conflict only served to slow down both programs.

In other cases the presence of expediters from only one service in a plant which was producing for both Departments sometimes resulted in unjustifiable emphasis being placed on the product for the service which had its men physically present in the plant.

The priorities system, intended to contribute to orderly production, in many cases acted to produce complications, especially in the early stages before quantity limitations were established. In 1943, for example, 80 percent of the capacity of one plant was being used by the Army for the production of forgings and castings for the heavy truck program. The Navy, by means of an overriding directive assigned to it for the landing craft program, entered this plant and reduced the Army production to approximately 20 percent of the plant's output. If persisted in, this action would have had the effect of shutting down eight or ten truck contractors for lack of forgings and castings. This particular problem was ironed out, but its solution was the result of emergency cooperation rather than coordination, and with a single procurement program would never have occurred.

Another source of production difficulty arising from the separate systems is that a delay in delivery of allocated raw material to a plant sometimes tied up an Army or a Navy contract, whereas there was already on hand a stock of the same material belonging to the other Department and not immediately needed. Yet the effort and paper work required to get a release of this stock to fill an emergency need was usually prohibitive.

In June 1944 a survey of inspection practices was made by the Corps of Engineers. This survey revealed 345 specific instances where similar or identical items of equipment were inspected by the Navy and the Corps of Engineers. In each instance separate and duplicate inspection and clerical personnel were maintained, either at the manufacturing plant or a district or a regional office, for the purpose of inspecting and accepting material, preparing inspection reports, shipment reports, bills of lading, and inspection records.

Duplication was particularly prevalent in the inspection of construction equipment, and such items as air-cooled, internal-combustion engines, and prefabricated buildings. Specifications and standards were either essentially the same or could have been easily standardized. In practically all the instances of duplication one staff could have performed inspection for both services with savings in manpower, and with reductions in production costs, due to greater standardization of the products manufactured.

The estimated cost of inspection for the Corps of Engineers, including salaries of inspectors and clerical personnel, in the 345 specific instances of duplication referred to, was $1,500,000 per year. It is reasonable to assume that the Navy spent a similar amount. One organization performing inspection for both services should result in a material saving over the combined inspection costs of the two services.

This example covers only a limited portion of the procurement field, but points to the substantial inspection savings possible if extended to all common procurement.

The integration of packing and marking of supplies and equipment also presents tremendous possibilities for improved operations and savings of time and money. Standardized packing procedures, and the development of standard packing materials designed to meet specific conditions, would greatly facilitate transportation problems and the protection of supplies shipped overseas.

Because of differing nomenclature and marking systems, similar items procured by the Army and Navy which were entirely suitable for use by either service bore different identification markings on the packages. As a result, personnel in the field were often unaware that an item in the storehouse of one service could, in an emergency, be used by the other. In the Army it is "Cap, Field, Cotton, OD," while the Navy calls its identical counterpart, "Cap, Utility, With Visor." In the Army it is "Power Unit TE-167" and in the Navy, "Emergency Power Equipment-E Series, Model EAL." The Army's "Radio Set SCR-695-A" is called by the Navy, "Airborne IFF Equipment-AB Series, Model ABF."

Another of the fields which would be productive of extensive economy in a unification of our armed forces is in the distribution, storage, and maintenance of supplies and equipment in common use.

As we have stated, basic logistic requirements for operation of the two services are the same. Also, much of the highly technical equipment is identical. Food, shelter, clothing, fuel, weapons, ammunition, communications, and transportation, together with the accompanying services, storage, distribution, and maintenance, should be provided the units of the armed forces through uniform procedures and consolidated channels by a single specialized organization.

The necessity for specialized control over storage has been demonstrated during the present war. There has been much overlapping in the equipment and operation of storage facilities by the armed forces through lack of coordination. A Storage Control Board was ultimately established in an effort to avoid competition for storage space among the various war agencies. Repeatedly depots have been established in a single strategic location by both of the armed forces. Among other things, this has resulted in strong competition in the local labor market. In numerous instances the labor supply which would have been ample for a consolidated facility has been inadequate for several. A combined supply system would do away with the duplication in the organization of administrative overhead, with the waste of critical and expensive storage space through the maintenance of separate reserves where one coordinated reserve would suffice.

As an example of circumstances under which it seems reasonable to believe that substantial savings would have followed consolidation of storage, on the east coast one department had two storage installations to supply fire-fighting equipment to fire stations, the other department had five. One service merged its own depots as the war progressed, the other did not. Had there been a consolidation between the services, as well as within the one, this would have eliminated six of the seven installations, saving probably 8,736,000 man-hours and approximately $14,700,000 in overhead operating costs during war years.

Army and Navy depots have been set up at many adjacent points throughout the United States and abroad. Even if one disregarded the savings in actual buildings and space, centralized establishment and operation would have done away with the construction of separate sets of access roads, railroad spurs, utilities, etc., amounting to approximately $2,000,000 per depot.

Refrigerated storage space was especially at a premium in the tropics. One service operated 5,885,936 square feet, and the other service established and maintained independently 2,430,658 square feet. Under a unified storage system the loss of tons of perishable supplies would have been prevented. In one instance one quarter of a million rations were lost on Guam because covered storage space was not available for use by one service, while at the same time large tonnages of nonperishable supplies were being stored under cover by the other service.

Large acreages throughout the Central Pacific were converted into separate open storage areas for use by the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Many common items, such as trucks, jeeps, power units, and lumber, carried either as reserves or as current stock, were stored separately. More effective use could be made of this vast space by a common storage plan. For example, a single reserve of motor vehicles of all types would have contributed savings in space occupied of about 25 to 30 percent. Substantial savings in personnel would also have accrued.

Unified operation would have permitted saving of an estimated 20,000,000 square feet of open hard standing space, or $10,000,000 in construction costs, based on reports of reserves of vacant space.

The Army engineers and the Sea Bees operate in the same sphere with respect to mechanical equipment maintenance. Both services have found it essential to consolidate all of their own depot stocks of spare parts for these activities. At Columbus, Ohio, over 200,000 separate items valued at $180,000,000 are currently in stock for one of the services. The other service plans a similar type of stockage in a central depot located in California. These undoubtedly could be merged into one facility to serve the needs of both services with resultant economies in stock control, stock management, overhead, and through reduced inventories.

With uncertainty as to what future operations might be assigned to either service the tendency was to stockpile or maintain liberal quantities of reserves to meet any eventuality. With separate supply systems there was no easy way for one department to draw on the other for items available in reserves or as overages at specific installations.

For example, additional spare parts for tractors were required by the Navy for preparation of operations based on Okinawa. Army engineers finally provided approximately $3,000,000 worth of these parts from their depot stocks, but this was possible only after several time-consuming meetings had been held between representatives of Navy and Army to determine the relative urgency of the operation, and to receive authority to make the necessary stock transfers.

Unified supply planning would have prevented dissipation of supplies through the establishment of numerous separate and uncoordinated stocks of identical items. Some graphic examples of the unbalanced situation in supply and demand, unavoidable without coordinated supply service, come from overseas.

At Woendi Island, New Guinea, in November 1944, one service had stocks of creosoted timber piling in reserve for contingencies while a dock construction job for the other service on Biak Island a few miles away was being delayed on account of a shortage of such piling. Local unified supply control would have obviated the delay in the critically needed project.

Aso on Biak Island, one service was salvaging lighterage pontoons to meet a critical shortage, while the other service was issuing considerable quantities from excess stocks at Finchafen, New Guinea, for use as water tanks.

As a further example of the headaches supply people get in combined operations with separate supply systems: The Commanding General of Pacific Ocean Area submitted a request for steel piling required at Okinawa for construction of port facilities assigned by Commander in Chief, Pacific Ocean Area, as an Army responsibility. The total requirement was for approximately 8,000 pieces weighing 12,300 tons and presented a major procurement problem, since steel was being closely allocated. Rolling facilities were operated at capacity. It was learned by Army that the phasing could not be met without assigning a high priority to obtain the necessary steel, which would necessitate cutting back production of shells, landing mats and other critical items. Informal inquiries of the Navy disclosed that the steel piling being produced was sufficient to meet all construction requirements in the Pacific Ocean Area, including that assigned the Army. It was not possible, however, to specify locations or purposes for which piling was being produced. A message was dispatched advising the Army supply chief in Pacific Ocean Area of the above, and requesting him to obtain the approval of the Commander in Chief, Pacific Ocean Area, for the diversion of the steel piling from Navy stocks to meet Army requirements at Okinawa. The diversion was approved, and accomplished by requisition on the Navy March 27, 1945, with provision for replacement in kind. On May 10, 1945, the Navy canceled its request for such replacement, the Army in turn canceling not only its procurement, but that portion of its allotment for steel, which required the mill to reschedule its rolling program. This sort of duplication of requirements could hardly occur with a unified supply service.

Army and Navy separately requisitioned railway equipment for operations in Hawaii, and consequently each procured this equipment under its own procurement methods. To further complicate the situation the Navy requirements were submitted in two sections, one to the Bureau of Yards and Docks, which purchased one type of equipment, and one to the Bureau of Ordnance, which placed another order, with the third type ordered by the Army from still another freight-car company. The result of these diversified purchases was that spare parts for the equipment were not interchangeable, and it was necessary to stock three different types of parts in Hawaii. Had a coordinated field requisition been submitted to a central procurement agency, a standard car would have been purchased.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I believed in unification before I started working on it. I did not have to become converted to it. I was in favor of it after the last war. I had watched the attempts at unification made at different times, so that I entered upon the task with zeal, and I think with understanding.

Sometimes there is a failure to realize the experience which Senators have had. Ordinarily a Chief of Staff serves for 4 years. He becomes acquainted with a group of Senators during that time but he knows them only as Senators. But the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], for example, one of the authors of the bill, who was a member of the old Senate Committee on Military Affairs, had served also as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House of Representatives before he came to the Senate, and is now a member of the Armed Services Committee. Such a man has had wide experience and has accumulated a mass of information during his years of service in the House and Senate on military matters. Probably he was chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs during the service of three or four Chiefs of Staff, and it was my privilege to know many of them.

On the committee were governors of many of the States, men who had had experience with the commanders of the National Guard and demobilization in cooperation with the Federal Government. On the committee were men who served in the last war, or who had personal knowledge of the services. On the committee were men who had had to do with military administration more years than one or two, probably throughout a whole generation. Aiding the committee was a man who has here, not as a Senator, but who was called in 1920 when the National Defense Act was passed. He had a part in the preparation of the National Defense Act. Talk about experience. It is there, Mr. President. On the committee was a man who served when the very first encampment of the National Guard and the Regular Army was held for training and experience. On the committee were men who conducted the Military Establishment not only in the last war but in peacetimes, men who served in the organization of the ROTC, men who had inspired the boys who later became the leaders of our men in the war.

Mr. President, I do not discount one whit the experience of the men who worked on the preparation of the Senate bill. I do, however, say that it is a shame that experience was not used in bringing the bill to fruition. The primary purpose of this bill is to enable the Senate of the United States to have the benefit of the experiences and the results of the studies, deliberations, and long dealings relating to this measure.

It is my hope that the preesnt Congress will be able to bring to completion the task of providing a sound legislative basis for the postwar organization of the armed forces. No action taken by the Congress could be more significant, whether viewed from the standpoint of fiscal economy or of national security, or on the broader horizon of our new and grave world responsibilities.

There is one rule in the operational activities of the American command, and the theories of command, which is not observed by other nations; and it is a good rule. In the American Army, in the case of a general order, or of a particular order, the men who are called upon to carry out the order are ordinarily briefed in the whole objective; just as a football player is not only told his place, but is also given an understanding of the places of the other 10 men in the team. So there is no confusion. In some armies of the world the servicemen are not trusted with that much knowledge. I served close to one, where it was deemed improper ever to teach the men who were to assist in the execution of a command, the purposes of the general or the purposes of the commanding officers. It was assumed that he would be a bad soldier, that he would try to be a general himself, that he would try to run the whole show, knowing nothing about teamwork. But the American boys know teamwork. They have played baseball; they have played football. From those experiences, they know what teamwork means; and I may add that the Senators of the United States have learned teamwork.

The most significant statement made by great generals who appeared before the committee was that morale is everything. Why is it everything? Because it is only through morale that teamwork is possible; second, there must be a team. Think of it. Our great generals are stressing that point, and I stress it here in regard to the unification of the services. It is not a matter of two teams attempting to carry out the same objective, but one team, working together, cooperating, dovetailing with each other's work and supporting each other's work.

It has not been my purpose, and it is not my purpose now, to analyze or to comment upon the plan of organization recently worked out jointly by the War and Navy Departments and recommended to the Congress by the President. My purpose is rather to summarize the experience acquired by the Committee on Military Affairs on this subject during the last session of Congress, and to review the considerations which necessitate some early step in the direction of the unification or of better coordination of the military departments.

Unfortunately, differences of opinion concerning the precise method of organization to be adopted prevented final action being taken last year. The point to be emphasized, however, is that no dispute existed, either within the armed forces or within the Congress, concerning the need of this sort of legislation.

A great admiral who appeared before the committee, in opposition to the original bill—he was not commenting on the final bill—pointed out that the original bill contained many things which were unwise, but, when asked point-blank, "Should we stop trying to do anything?" he said, "No, Mr. Chairman; there are too many things that must be done in order to improve the services." I assumed from that that there was no objection to our proceeding; and we went ahead.

It can also be said that little if any difference of opinion existed as to the general objectives to be sought by legislative action. The long and sometimes bitter controversy over reorganization of the armed forces must not be permitted to obscure these significant facts. One admiral, testifying against the bill, made point after point; leading me to say to him. "Because of what you have said, Admiral, I am in favor of the bill." While they were in theory against the bill, the argument they made against it actually proved the need of it.

The problem with which we grappled in the last Congress, and which now concerns the present Congress, is anything but a new one. Even before World War I, the Commission on Efficiency and Economy appointed by President Taft in 1912 was planning a study of the merger of the Army and Navy when its work was terminated by the Congress. Following World War I there was wide interest in reorganization, arising partly out of military considerations, and partly out of a desire to achieve economies. In 1922 President Harding recommended that the two services be placed under a single Cabinet officer. Both services offered strong resistance to this proposal in hearings before a joint committee of the Congress in 1924, and the joint committee rejected the recommendation. In 1925, under the chairmanship of Representative Lambert, Republican, of Wisconsin, a congressional committee of inquiry into the operations of the United States Air Service made a favorable report on the proposal for a single Department of National Defense with three coordinate branches. Again the War and Navy Departments voiced strong objection.

In September 1925, following the Shenandoah disaster, President Coolidge appointed the President's Aircraft Board under the chairmanship of Dwight Morrow, a former Senator from New Jersey. Perhaps the strongest advocate of unification before this Board was Colonel Mitchell. The Board came to the conclusion that the disadvantages of a single department outweighed the advantages. Studies made by the services themselves came to a like conclusion.

The only time the issue has come to a vote in either House of Congress was in 1932, when the House Appropriations Committee included a provision for consolidation of the War and Navy Departments in an appropriation bill. The House rejected it by a small margin. In the same year the House Committee on Expenditures held hearings on two unification measures, but in view of strong opposition from both Departments did not report them out. In view of later experience, it is interesting to cite the testimony of the Secretary of War before this committee, to the effect that the "necessity for tactical cooperation in war between the land and naval forces will not exist except in very special or abnormal cases." No statement could better illustrate the failure of our military and civilian leaders during this period to visualize the impact of technology on warfare.

Further proposals and studies were made in 1933 and 1934. In the latter year a military-civilian board, headed by Newton D. Baker, came out against both a separate air force and a single department, stating that "the committee believes that the machinery set up for the coordination of the Army and Navy is adequate for the purpose." Here again is a striking illustration of inability to visualize the intimacy of the interservice coordination required in modern warfare.

Before the last war, about in 1935, a bill was introduced by my former colleague Senator King, of Utah, to unite the services.

Before the present President of the United States became the Vice President, while he was still a Senator, he wrote an article in Collier's magazine in favor of the unification of the services. For historical reasons and because of its value to the committee, I ask that the article written by President Truman when he was a Senator, appearing on page 192 of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

OUR ARMED FORCES MUST BE UNIFIED

(By Harry S. Truman, United States Senator from Missouri)

THE DEMOCRATIC VICE PRESIDENTIAL NOMINEE PLEADS FOR THE MERGER OF OUR ARMED FORCES AND CITES THE PRICE WE HAVE PAID FOR LACK OF COORDINATION IN THE PAST

Proof that a divine Providence watches over the United States is furnished by the fact that we have managed to escape disaster even though our scrambled professional military set-up has been an open invitation to catastrophe. The bitter lessons of the last few years, however, make it plain that we can rely no longer upon chance and luck. The Nation's safety must have a more solid foundation.

An obvious first step is a consolidation of the Army and the Navy that will put all of our defensive and offensive strength under one tent and one authoritative, responsible command—a complete integration that will consider the national security as a whole. Absolute cohesion instead of independent departments and agencies, each with its own pride of identity, its prejudices and jealous rivalries that masquerade as esprit de corps.

These are not new conclusions with me. For years the American Legion, out of the membership's first-hand knowledge of the need, has urged the unification of the country's fighting forces. I helped to frame this legion policy and endorsed it without reservation. As a Senator, faced daily with the confusions and conflicts inherent in separated commands, what was a belief has grown into a sincere conviction. But if this background had been lacking, what happened on December 7, 1941, would have made me the ardent champion of a single authority over everything that pertains to America's safety. As nothing else, Pearl Harbor revealed the danger that lies in a division of responsibilities.

For weeks it was known that Japan planned war, building ships and planes for operations across the Pacific, and yet throughout that perilous time, national security rested on conferences and correspondence as the one authorized means of assuring the necessary coordination between Army and Navy. In Washington, Secretary Stimson and Secretary Knox could meet or exchange letters. In Hawaii, General Short and Admiral Kimmel could meet, if they happened to be on speaking terms, or exchange cables and radiograms.

This is not meant as criticism. Under existing conditions no other course was possible. Each Secretary could give orders only within the confines of his own Department, and there was the same division of power and function in the field. Not one team and one huddle, but two teams and two huddles. And with what result?

According to the report of the Presidential commission, headed by Justice Roberts: "While General Short and Admiral Kimmel conferred frequently with respect to joint Army-Navy plans and procedures, they did not, on or subsequent to November 27, 1941, hold any conference specifically directed to the meaning of the messages received from the War and Navy Departments, or concerning action required to be taken pursuant to those messages."

I quote again from the report: "On and after November 27, 1941, the commanding general, Hawaiian Department, and the commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet, took such action as each deemed appropriate to the existing situation. Neither informed the other specifically of the action he was taking, and neither inquired of the other whether any action had been taken, nor did they consult as to the appropriateness of the actions taken by them respectively."

Without entering into the question of personal remissness, I hold that a principal fault was the division of authority that necessitated conferences over two sets of orders instead of obedience to one set of orders.

The report also brought out the habit of independent action bred by years of separation. A direct responsibility of the Army was the operation of an aircraft-warning system. By November 27 only certain mobile equipment had been installed, and because of it, the (a. m. okay) system operated only from 4 a. m. to 7 a. m.

At no time, however, did Admiral Kimmel ask or receive information as to the manner in which the Army was discharging its highly important duty. The Navy, for its part, was entrusted with the task of conducting distant air reconnaissances, radiating from Oahu to a distance of seven or eight hundred miles. No such reconnaissances were conducted except during drills and maneuvers, but never once did General Short endeavor to ascertain how the Navy was handling the job.

Granting neglects and derelictions, what stands clearer than that the root cause of the Pearl Harbor tragedy was the lack of a single national security set-up, and the fact that two Secretaries in Washington issued their separate commands to two field commanders, each reared in a tradition that cooperation carries the risk of endangering independence?

This entire article could be devoted to the violent and incessant quarreling that marked Army and Navy relations during the Spanish-American War. Admirals and generals indulged in petty jealousies and animosities to a point that might well have proved fatal but for the weakness of the enemy. But why go back to Cuba and Pearl Harbor? Today, as I write, there are at hand equally striking illustrations of the peril that lies in treating the national security as something that can be cut up into bureaucratic divisions and subdivisions, all at the mercy of pull and haul.

As chairman of a special Senate committee, created in March 1941, to check up on the national defense program, my fellow members and I are still recording a dreary succession of wastes, duplications, and ugly conflict. That the war effort has succeeded so magnificently, in spite of major obstacles, is a tribute to the courage and resourcefulness of our people.

General Marshall and Admiral King, a good team working in complete accord, have promoted a happier relationship between their two branches, but not even these remarkable men have eased all of the frictions. A stiff-necked contentiousness still marks Army and Navy contacts in the lower echelons and will continue to mark them as long as each arm enjoys an independent status. The failure of General Short and Admiral Kimmel to act as one was the inevitable expression of a traditional cleavage between the two branches.

I do not intend this as an attack or even an arraignment. What else can be expected of an organizational arrangement that departmentalizes the national security, authorizing and encouraging rivalry? I can recall instance after instance where unity, the sense of belonging to the same team, was buried under a weight of partisanship. An unconscious reaction to lifelong training.

Not long since, a DC-3 Navy plane was grounded for 10 days at an airfield in Kansas through the loss of an aileron hinge. A Douglas factory, within easy flying distance, had plenty of these hinges, but could not release them as the parts were being turned out under an Army contract. As a consequence, it was necessary for the grounded plane to establish communication with the aviation supply office in Philadelphia, which in turn channeled through to the Naval Air Transport Service in Oakland. It was from California that the aileron hinge went to Kansas.

There is no available estimate of the millions wasted by unnecessary duplications. Each service maintains its own set of stock aircraft parts and its own organizational set-up for their handling and distribution. There is the same reproduction of facilities in aviation training, although the general pattern is the same except in advanced stages. In many areas, both at home and abroad, separate Army and Navy flying fields have been built at great expense, in some cases actually side by side.

NO SURRENDER OF IDENTITY

It is true, of course, that specialized facilities are required such as water for seaplanes, yet in the majority of cases common use is entirely feasible. But no. There must not be any surrender of identity. As a further example, each service has its separate and distinct set of calibers for artillery with just the minute fractional differences which prevent the ammunition from being interchangeable.

The records of the special committee are piled high with instances of waste due to the operational gulf that yawns between the services. During the camp-construction program, millions were spent for bulldozers, tractors, trucks, cranes, lumber, and so forth, the Army and Navy competing for this equipment. Not only was there no joint purchasing board, but an equal lack of cooperation, when it came to disposal, resulted in additional loss. The Army's recapture clauses were badly drawn and loosely applied, and the Navy contracts contained no recapture provisions at all. Forms were not even provided in connection with disposition.

The case of lumber offers a good illustration. Prior to the start of the camp program, prices averaged $30 per thousand board feet. By September 1940, due to the spirited competition of war contractors, the average climbed to $41.10. Then, and only then, lumber purchases were centralized, and within a year, prices dropped to $29.35 per thousand board feet. The actual loss, due to competitive bidding, was figured out by the committee as $13,017,576. Not much, compared with total expenditures, but worth saving.

Other millions were squandered by duplications in the construction of bases and camps. The Great Lakes Training Station, with additional housing, might well have accommodated both the Army and the Navy. If necessary, powerhouses, laundries, general facilities could have been expanded.

Instead of working out a plan for joint use, the Army rushed into Chicago and bought up hotels in a manner that can only be characterized as headlong. The huge Stevens Hotel was purchased, its furnishings sold, and then vacated after 13 months of occupancy. The Congress Hotel was acquired after putting the management to much trouble and expense, only to have the Army decide that it was not needed after all.

The famous Detroit Tool case, in particular, emphasizes the wastefulness of independent, uncoordinated action in the war effort. In December 1940 the Army awarded contracts for a certain type of airplane engine, but switched to another company after a large amount of cutting tools had been made.

The value of these surplus tools, at a fair estimate, was $1,721,136, and yet they were sold as scrap in 1943 for $36,924—about 2 percent of their value. Misleading inventories induced the War Production Board to authorize the auction. Our special committee, in the course of its investigations, uncovered this strange transaction, and, as a result, the Army claims to have repossessed 95 percent of the tools.

Speaking of the War Production Board, think how its work would be simplified if the war agencies were all under one tent. Then there would be just one claimant for strategic materials, making its own allocations with an eye single to the actual requirements of each service, and preserving a fair balance. As it is, the Army and the Navy are now competing claimants before the WPB, each pressing its demands in rivalry with the other. A screening board has corrected the situation in some degree, but before its creation the Navy and the Maritime Commission virtually cornered all of the Nation's valve-making facilities, putting other claimants in the position of Mother Hubbard.

A FLAGRANT EXAMPLE OF WASTE

These instances could be multiplied indefinitely from committee files, but the Canol project best serves to drive home my point that only unification of the fighting arms of Government can stop appalling wastes. This undertaking was for the supply of oil to the Alaskan area from a field in the vicinity of Norman Wells, in Canada, only 75 miles south of the Arctic Circle. Lt. Gen. Brehon B. Somervell authorized the project on April 30, 1942, estimating the cost at $34,000,000 and directing that it be completed by October 1, 1942.

All hopes with no base in reality. Canol did not come even into partial operation until May 1944, and then only with limited quantities of truck gasoline produced at excessive cost. And instead of $34,000,000, the bill on that date had mounted to $134,000,000, not counting the pay of officers and enlisted men for several months and the cost of air transport.

General Somervell, called to the witness stand, admitted that no other department of Government was ever consulted. The Navy had as great an interest in oil for Alaska as the Army, but the Navy was ignored. So were the Petroleum Administrator, the War Production Board, the War Shipping Administration, and Lend-Lease. General Somervell, in fact, stated quite bluntly that the project was out of their fields and not part of their job. Here was not merely a refusal to cooperate, but the positive assertion by one agency that others did not have to be considered, even though equally interested.

Had other war agencies been consulted, there is small doubt that Canol would have died a-borning. On learning about the project, after it was under way, the Secretary of the Navy, the Petroleum Administrator, and the War Production Board united in urging its abandonment. Secretary Ickes went so far as to brand the undertaking as "well-nigh fantastic," and the WPB damned it as a "huge and useless program * * * which will never serve a useful purpose." Testimony was offered that four tankers, at any time after April 30, 1942, could have carried in one trip more 100-octane gasoline, motor gasoline, and fuel oil than would be produced by the entire Canol project by January 1, 1945.

Worse than the squandering of millions was the waste of manpower and vital supplies. Some 200,000 tons of scarce materials and transportation equipment, urgently needed elsewhere, was diverted to Canol's use. Taken from the war effort were a host of Army officers, 4,000 enlisted men, and 12,000 civilians—all because of an unintegrated military set-up under which coordination cannot be compelled.

Turning away from waste and wrangles, there is still another argument for unification, to which I attach considerable weight. It is the tendency of Government bureaus to get set in their ways, developing autocracies of thought and habit that make them hostile to change, even when change is commanded by progress. The Army and the Navy are no exceptions to the rule. The Army, it may be remembered, resisted mechanization with a good deal of stubbornness, the Navy frowned on the submarine, forcing the inventor to take it to England, and both branches joined in fairly effective opposition to the expansion of the aircraft program, hampering it for quite a while. What runs counter to their prejudices and preconceptions has a hard time of it.

The case of the helicopter is a good illustration of the manner in which the closed minds of department heads can sabotage ideas that appeal to them as newfangled. Several years before the outbreak of war, attention was called to the need of some type of rotary-wing craft that could hover motionless and arise and descend vertically. Such a performance, naturally, would make it of enormous value in reconnaissance, rescue work, and antisubmarine operations. It was obviously a naval job, but the Navy refused to consider the suggestion, stating it was without belief in that type of craft.

Certain Army officers, however, became interested in a Sikorsky development called the helicopter, and when Congress appropriated $2,000,000 for research in 1938, the funds were placed under the direction and control of the War Department. Nevertheless, the helicopter's importance as a part of naval armament was recognized, and the Navy was specifically instructed to cooperate by the preparation and submission of plans and requirements. These instructions were not followed, and Navy heads even evidenced irritation at what they considered external pressure.

The Army, unaided, carried tests to a successful conclusion, whereupon the Navy sought to create a public impression that naval men had developed the helicopter and that it even had a number of them in use as an antisubmarine weapon. The committee found that the Navy was not entitled to any credit for the helicopter, but, on the contrary, deserved censure for having discouraged its development. There was no question in our minds that the value of the helicopter could have been demonstrated a full year earlier but for the Navy's indifference.

A companion piece is provided by our experience with amphibious landing craft. With war in the Pacific a virtual certainty, a first requirement was shallow-draft, self-propelling vessels capable of carrying troops, mechanized equipment, and supplies through shoals and over reefs in beach landings. Without them a successful invasion is admittedly impossible. Andrew Jackson Higgins, the New Orleans dynamo, had specialized in this type of craft, but the Navy's Bureau of Ships would have none of him. Out of departmental pride and as a proof of self-sufficiency the Bureau refused to accept Higgins' proved performance and proceeded to develop a design of its own.

Repeatedly and vigorously, the armed forces reported that the Bureau design was of questionable seaworthiness and far inferior to the Higgins type, but this caused no change in the Navy's attitude. Instead of confessing failure, the Bureau patched up its own design and awarded contracts for 1,100 of Bureau design to contractors who had no experience in building tank lighters. Higgins, the only successful builder of tank lighters, was excluded from the list. Finally, in conclusive tests made off Norfolk, the Bureau's design failed miserably, while the Higgins boat came through with flying colors. The Navy, no longer able to ignore facts, then ordered its contractors to switch to the Higgins design.

Not weeks or months were wasted by this stubbornness but five full years; likewise a large amount of money. To cite only one item, 225 Bureau lighters, costing $7,000,000, had to be junked. The special committee, as a result of investigation, could only conclude that the conduct of the Navy indicated a reluctance on the part of its personnel to accept any design but its own, even though this involved a flagrant disregard of the facts, if not also of the safety of American troops.

It is not only the prides of departments that constitute a source of danger. Interdepartmental jealousies also rip the fabric of unity. The marines, for example, feel strongly that when landings are made by Leathernecks, marine flyers should be assigned to the duty of supporting them. Instead, Navy fighters take over, and the air force of the marines is handed the less spectacular job of patrol.

But why pile up proof when official admission of the need for unification has already been made? Under pressure by Congress, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have set up a committee of two Navy and two Army officers to study and recommend "as to the most efficient practicable organization of those parts of the executive branch of our Government which are primarily concerned with the national defense."

Where do we go from there? The road, as I see it, stretches straight and with no turns. West Point and Annapolis, by way of a good beginning, should not be continued as competitive institutions, fostering rivalries that never die down. What better way to compel a sense of national security's oneness than a system of exchange between the two academies? At some point in the final period of instruction, switch the cadets to Annapolis and the middies to West Point. Break up the tradition that the Army and the Navy are separate and distinct, with the success of one endangering the success of the other.

The end, of course, must be the integration of every element of America's defense in one department under one authoritative, responsible head. Call it the War Department or the Department of National Security or what you will, just so it is one department. The Secretary at the top would have at his side the necessary number of aides, such as one Under Secretary each for the ground forces, the naval forces, and the air forces. Sea, land, and air would thus be joined as a unit, its strength and effectiveness unimpaired by competitive prides and service jealousies.

Assistant Secretaries, under the eye and orders of the Secretary, would work on the same unitary base. Operations would have charge of all training programs, and Personnel would consolidate the civil and military requirements of all combatant arms. After induction through the machinery of the selective service, allocation would be the business of this centralized authority. As it has been, the Army and Navy compete for trainees. The Navy, for example, kept on with the voluntary system after the enactment of the selective-service law, and maintained an unfair advantage over the Army by taking boys of 18 and even younger.

One central control of procurement and supplies would end the present mob action that puts Government agencies in the market as competitive bidders. In the last war it was a great joke that the Navy "got the jump" on the Army, filling warehouses beyond all possible need and hoarding in spite of the Army's pressing necessities. Conditions today are better than they were, but I say again that lack of a single purchasing agency has caused the waste of millions.

AN UNDIVIDED COMMAND

There, then, you have one team with all the reins in one hand and, as a further aid to intelligent driving, a General Staff at the Secretary's right hand. Not a Joint Chiefs of Staff, with the conciliation of independent commands as a principal duty, but a General Staff in full charge of tactics and strategy, viewing the Nation's offense and defense as an indivisible whole, and totally unconcerned with service rivalries.

A sketchy outline, but full enough to make its advantages stand clear. Under such a set-up another Pearl Harbor will not have to be feared, for instead of two sets of orders from Washington to two field commanders, one order will go out from a single secretary to one supreme head in each theater of operations.

An end to the dangerous dependence on coordination and cooperation between independent departments and independent commands and the constant fear that this general and that admiral may not be on speaking terms. Strategy and tactics planned without regard for the identity and traditions of separate services, and based solely on ships, guns, tanks, planes, artillery, etc., as a common pool. A concentration of America's defensive and offensive strength under one command, ending the present jangles and jumbles.

There is still one point that I think it well to make: In no sense is unification a radical proposal. The fathers of the Republic, in their wisdom, considered the national defense as an indivisibility, and a single War Department was created by act of Congress on August 7, 1789. Not until April 30, 1798, did the advocates of an independent navy succeed in their effort. If Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, and Franklin, in their distant time, believed in the full integration of America's offensive and defensive strength, how much more important it is today when modern war has leveled mountains, dried up oceans, and annihilated space.

PREWAR METHODS OF COORDINATION

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the result of this reluctance to interfere with the traditional independence of the two military Departments was that coordination remained almost wholly dependent on voluntary agreement, except at the level of Presidential action. In matters of operational planning the primary coordinating agency was the Joint Board established in 1903 by voluntary agreement of the two Secretaries and wholly without legislative basis. It had advisory functions only and its recommendations could take effect only through approval and promulgation of the Secretaries.

In the course of the years, joint boards and committees were set up by voluntary action in many other areas to deal with problems common to the services. Through the efforts of these joint boards and committees some progress in coordination was achieved. An example was the application in some cases of the principle of single procurement, whereby one service purchased the requirements of both. Generally speaking, however, only a small part of the logistics and procurement field was effectively coordinated. Nor did there exist any effective coordination of research and scientific development, military training, personnel policies, and intelligence activities.

CHANGES IN ORGANIZATION AFTER PEARL HARBOR

It required very little experience of actual warfare to demonstrate the inadequacy of the existing organization. Following Pearl Harbor, important changes were made both in the internal organization of the Departments, and with respect to interdepartmental and interservice coordination. By unformalized Executive action the Joint Chiefs of Staff was established to integrate military policy and strategy. In effect, it replaced the Joint Board, which was advisory only. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, subject to Presidential approval on major decisions, exercised direct authority over field commanders. The principle of unified command in theaters of operation was early found necessary and was applied by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in most instances. The internal organization of the War Department was drastically revised by Executive action, and Army Air Forces made an autonomous unit. The number of joint boards and committees increased until there were nearly two hundred, including subcommittees. Every one of those actions is an argument for and testimony as to the need of what is attempted to be accomplished by the unification bill.

LEGISLATION NEEDED EVEN TO CONTINUE WARTIME CHANGES

Studies made of wartime operations, including the study made by the Senate Military Affairs Committee in the Seventy-ninth Congress, demonstrate beyond any reasonable doubt the desirability of improving in some manner the organization set up during the war. It should be pointed out, however, that legislation is necessary even to give permanent status to the wartime organization. For example, the autonomous position of the Army Air Forces, the present organization of the War Department's supply and procurement system, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff agency are all based on executive action having temporary effect. It is unthinkable that the type of organization in existence before Pearl Harbor should ever be restored. The Congress cannot, therefore, escape the responsibility of deciding, and deciding soon, what type of postwar organization we are to have.

EVIDENCE OF NEED FOR BETTER COORDINATION

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs conducted lengthy hearings on the reorganization of the armed forces during the last 3 months of 1945. Prior to that the Select Committee of the House on Postwar Military Policy—the Woodrum committee—had held hearings in 1944. A special committee of the Joint Chiefs of Staff made a thorough investigation and presented a detailed report in April 1945. Later in that year the Eberstadt report was made public, and in December the President sent a special message to the Congress recommending a general plan of reorganization.

The Eberstadt report was drawn up on behalf of the Secretary of the Navy. Mr. Eberstadt appeared before our subcommittee, took part in several of the proceedings, and helped with the planning of what became one of the prints of the bill. There is much of the Eberstadt report in the bill.

A subcommittee of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, consisting of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], former Senator Austin, and myself, devoted several months of careful consideration to the problem in the light of these and other studies and recommendations. The testimony was rich in details with respect to wartime coordination in every area of planning and operations. While the witnesses did not agree perfectly in all cases as to the effectiveness of the coordinating mechanism, this was not the real point of conflict. No one seriously maintained that coordination was as effective as it should have been. Argument came on the question whether more effective coordination should be attempted by perfecting the organization that evolved during the war, or by adopting a more drastic change. What I wish to stress here are the broad underlying considerations pointing to the need for better coordination. Once these considerations are thoroughly understood, arguments over methods assume their proper perspective.

MILITARY POLICY AND STRATEGY

The war demonstrated the intimate interdependence of the land, sea, and air forces. It demonstrated also the increasing tempo of war. In the future the factors of interdependence and speed will be more important than ever before. This means that it will not be safe to wait until a war breaks out to devise a method of coordinating programs and strategic planning. Our lack of preparation in this respect was costly in the last war. With the war weapons of the future any such unpreparedness would be fatal.

Once established the Joint Chiefs of Staff was a vast improvement over previous methods of coordination in the field of strategic planning. Either by extension of the Joint Chiefs of Staff functions or by some new device, however, more effective provision must be made for deciding broad questions of military policy. If the Joint Chiefs of Staff is to exercise this function, it should be given a statutory basis for it. If there is a question whether an agency operating by unanimous consent can in peacetime reach decisions in such matters as the allocation of available manpower and resources, then some other device will have to be provided. The inescapable fact is that the peacetime military program must be planned as a whole. If this is to be done properly, we cannot allow the separate services to formulate their broad programs without regard to each other's needs, and then coordinate them by executive and legislative action. Military policies must first be integrated within the armed forces themselves.

THE MILITARY BUDGET

The military budget is directly related to military policy. Integration of one requires integration of the other. Even during the war the services continued to formulate and send to the Congress their separate requests for appropriations, coordinated only by Presidential action. The Congress cannot possibly provide the necessary integration at that late stage. What is needed is a military budget, not military budgets. Once again, the specific method by which such a budget is to be formulated is a matter of less importance than the provision of some method. At present the Congress cannot hope to relate the programs of the separate services, and it will never be in a position to evaluate the military program until it establishes the organizational basis for the integration of military programs and budget requests.

In short, budgetary integration would serve to economize on expenditures and to facilitate coordination of military policies and programs.

In the Reorganization Act itself the Congress has already taken action in regard to unification. We have combined the military and naval committees. That means that of necessity there will be coordination in the making of laws dealing with the military policy of the United States and dealing with the Navy on a broad basis. It is inevitable that unification will follow the organization which Congress has already established. It was understood by those who were working on the reorganization of Congress that in time this was inevitable; and the first thing that we decided upon in that committee was that there should be unification of the armed services.

That will have a lasting effect, an effect for the good of both services as time goes on. I can see now, experienced as the members of the Military Affairs Committee were in military affairs of the United States, that if we had had the benefit of the experience gained by the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs the Government could have acted more wisely and with more certainty than it did.

UNIFIED COMMAND IN THEATERS OF OPERATION

The necessity of a unified command in each field of operation is now accepted. To be fully effective, however, unified command in the field requires more than mere possession of command. Most helpful in securing evidence on this point was the investigation conducted during the war by the special committee of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The great majority of field officers interviewed, including ranking officials of both the Army and the Navy, testified as to the need for greater coordination of departmental policies generally. Unified command in theaters of operation is adversely affected by indecision or delays resulting from separatism in the top command; by differences in supply systems and requirements; by differences in training methods and personnel policies; and by lack of coordination in other areas.

Any idea that the problem of reorganization of the armed forces can be solved by establishing unified command in theaters of operation runs counter to the whole experience of the war. The real question is how much and what kind of coordination at the top is essential to support unified command in the field.

PARITY FOR THE AIR FORCE

Shortly after we entered the war, Army Air Forces was given substantial autonomy within the framework of the Army. It can no longer be questioned that the air arm has a special contribution to strategy and tactics equal to those of the ground and sea forces. In one way or another, therefore, the air force must be given an organizational status identical to that of the other services.

Mr. President, as late as the civil war in Spain great generals pointed out to me that the war in Spain "proves that the air service is merely auxiliary." Practically nothing has been so long a-borning as the attempt to bring the air service into a primary position. Not to leave them in the position which they gained by necessity during the war would be a backward step indeed. No one contemplates taking such a step. The ideal position then for the Air Forces, and the only one which will make them really and truly effective in receiving their training and carrying on their mission, is one in which there will be brought home to them the interdependency of the forces, and, therefore, the necessity for the unification of planning, scheming, ordering, and executing.

Parity for the Air Force, however, must be achieved in such a manner as not to augment separatism either in organization or in spirit. The granting of parity to the Air Force should be an integral part of a complete reorganization, a major objective of which must be the provision for teamwork among the Ground, Sea, and Air Forces at all stages of planning and operations. Simply to establish a new Department of the Air Forces would complicate greatly the already difficult problem of coordinating two military departments. The need for parity of the Air Forces must thus be recognized as an additional and powerful argument for the establishment of a more effective organization of the combined services.

ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY IN SUPPLIES AND SERVICES
